THE New Year is greeted hopefully by many a man who believes it cannot bring him worse luck than he had in 1896.

THE excommunication of Tolstoi by the Holy Synod of the Greek church may be expected to have about as much effect as the famous ban laid upon the jackdaw of Rheims.

GOVERNOR BUDD favors some radical changes in the laws relative to the commitment of insane persons, and to the management of the State asylums. It is high time for some remedial legislation in this respect.

THE late train-wrecking in Alabama, with its awful loss of life, indicates not only the necessity of making this atrocious crime punishable with death, but also the need of a rigorous enforcement of the penalty. A due regard for the safety of the public makes this imperative.

REAL estate men say, with good reason, that there was never a better time than this for investment in San Francisco. Property has suffered a downward tendency for three years past, but the indications are now decidedly favorable for a general improvement in this regard.

ACCORDING to reports received by the State Board of Trade, more people are coming into California this winter than for many years past. This is gratifying intelligence. With this immigration of homeseekers, and improved prices for wheat, land values should rise and there should be a general return of prosperity.

THE learned gentlemen who attempt to substitute reason and analysis for authority and faith, as foundations for the Christian religion, merely create alarm and uncertainty where before there was serene, if unthinking, confidence and belief. It is but a step from the so-called "rational" Christianity to complete agnosticism.

ATREATY of arbitration between England and America, if agreed upon as reported, will rank as one of the most notable achievements of the present Administration. It may not be an absolute safeguard against war, but it gives to both countries assurances of a long continuance of their present peaceful relations.

THERE is bitter complaint in Germany that the aristocracy have a monopoly of official positions in the civil service, as well as in the army and navy. The mutterings of discontent among the masses, and the rapid growth of socialism and democracy, indicate that the imperial Government is more in danger from the German people than from its foreign enemies.

THE experiment of rural mail delivery is shortly to be tried in a district of Santa Clara county, by order of the postal authorities. Should the results be satisfactory, farmers and fruit growers in all well populated localities will, we hope, be afforded the same facilities. They are entitled to all the conveniences the Government may be enabled to furnish.

IT is not always wise to give advice about making money, but to those who are seeking a profitable rural industry it seems perfectly safe to recommend the cultivation of the orange in suitable localities of Northern California. The fruit matures so early, in the foothills of this division of the State, that it comes into market in November, thus securing to the grower much better prices than can be had for the bulk of the Southern California crop.

NEWs comes from Berlin that three hundred German factories have resumed work, in consequence of the election of McKinley. This is rather curious. His victory, the Protectionists assured us, would reopen the mills and factories in this country—not in Europe. The explanation may be that the German manufacturers expect to sell goods in America, despite the tariff, and to get their pay in sound money.

THE low price of silver has led to increase of gold mining in Nevada, where many promising auriferous properties are being developed. It is of course well known that a large percentage of the Comstock bullion has been gold, but Nevada has been generally regarded as identified with the one great mining interest of silver. In the future, however, it may be that her output of gold will exceed that of the white metal.

THE darkest blot in the history of California politics is undoubtedly the treachery of U. S. Senator George C. Perkins towards the Hon. James C. Waymire, in not exerting his influence to secure for him, as California's representative, a position to McKinley's cabinet. Judge Waymire has hosts of friends in this State who had hoped to see him thus honored in return for his invaluable services to his party. A better man could not be found, and that he has been turned down by the delegation at Washington goes far to prove that Senator Perkins is unaware of the desires of the party he is supposed to represent, and with which he is expected to be in accord.

IF such sensational journals as the Examiner could be believed, a large part of the business of the American courts consists in invalidating laws on the pretense that they are unconstitutional, the true reason being that the acts in question do not suit the judges. There is very little foundation for such sweeping strictures. It would be wholly useless to have written constitutions, unless their terms are to be enforced, and necessarily this power can be exercised only through the courts. If judges are not to follow their honest opinions, and are to be governed by popular sentiment of the clamor of newspapers, our constitutions would better be abolished altogether.

THE grave charges preferred by Mr. Frank Schmidt against those in authority at the City and County Hospital, and accusing certain doctors there (whose names are unfortunately unknown) of improperly treating and insulting his wife while undergoing an operation, must not be allowed to pass unnoticed. Not only the press of this city, but also all reputable practitioners, should demand that the matter be looked into immediately and that the guilty parties, if convicted upon investigation, receive commensurate punishment. The City and County Hospital has long been little less than a disgrace to the city, and if it be true that defenceless women are insulted there, then the whole management must be changed. As taxpayers, we have a right to demand it.

Truth About Our Farmers. The Bryanite orators during the late campaign worked the country into almost sadness over the condition of the Western farmers. On the highest official authority, we now know that there was more fiction than fact in the oratory of that time. The report of the Secretary of Agriculture, just issued, tells us that seventy-two per cent of the farms in the United States, occupied by their owners, are absolutely free from mortgages or other incumbrances, and that three-fourths of the borrowings have gone either for the purchase of farms or their improvement. The West and South, he shows, are comparatively free from mortgages, and that it is the older and poorer farms along the north Atlantic that are in debt. This is particularly true of New Jersey, which, in proportion to its farm values, carries a greater burden of indebtedness than any other State in the union. The recent claims that the farmers are almost universally in debt, despondent and suffering, the Secretary declares to be without any foundation, a belittlement of agriculture, and an indignity to every intelligent and practical farmer. The tillers of the soil, he says, are not mendicants, nor wards of the Government, to be treated to annuities, but the representatives of the oldest, most honorable, and most essential occupation of the human race, upon which all other vocations depend for subsistence and prosperity. Farmers are proverbially grumblers, and as such, too frequently mislead people not over familiar with their ways. Most of them have a snug little sum put away to meet any emergency, and with those who have not there is no need to waste sympathy. The man who has a farm fairly well stocked is about as securely and certainly provided for as any man can be in this world. He can live on his own, even though he see not a dollar of money. City life has its charms for men who like excitement, more or less unhealthy, but for sober satisfaction and true comfort the life of the husbandman is much to be preferred. Nowhere else in this wide world are his lines cast in more pleasant places than in this fair California of ours.

Who Shall Be Our Senator? The loyalty of Californians to deserving Californians is proverbial. This is probably due to the fact that, as a rule, Californians are hard workers, and struggles that culminate in success are ever respected. Few of our leading men were nursed in the lap of luxury; nearly all of them have swung themselves into prominence by continued application. With our young men to-day this is as much a truth as it was of their sires in the days of '49. And the young men are the Jones, especially in politics, who are to the fore at present. In the Republican party there are many young men worthy and able of taking a position beside the Honorable Stephen M. White in the United States Senate. It only remains to be settled which one is most worthy of being sent there.

We run through with pride the recognition extended in the past to such men as Sargent, Miller, Williams, Felton, all men of strong individuality. Then comes Perkins, who has been honored as Governor and Senator, but has always filled his positions with indifference, and has never been bold enough a statesman to carry the confidence of his whole State. He has always had about him a little clique or private combination that he makes use of, and whom he has always repaid with some small place, or, more frequently, with a promise unfulfilled. In the last campaign he was unmindful of the pre-eminent and all-absorbing consideration that was McKinley and Hobart, and almost lost the State to the Party by getting up dissensions in trying to pledge the various County delegations to him for United States Senator. In little or nothing did he advance the cause of the general ticket, either by personal effort or by contribution. In the last, as in other campaigns, he withheld himself, to use a common expression, to see which way the cat was going to jump, before he became active. Whenever he thought that the Republican party would be successful, then with a great hurrah and fuss and feathers he suddenly appeared upon the scene, and attempted to convey the impression that he had been doing everything necessary to carry the whole campaign.

By singular contrast, we can name numbers of men who have been unselfishly devoted to the Republican party, and who for years have served it in season and out of season, and who served it best when success seemed most doubtful. They were stimulated by the very possibility to their best efforts on account of impending defeat, and all for the love of party without the hope of reward, save the pride of party success. We recall a few instances of men who were not only prominent in the last campaign, but also in the campaigns of the last fifteen years. George Knight, General Barnes, General Chipman, Samuel M. Shortridge, Judge Carpenter, Frank Coombs, Colonel John P. Jackson, Judge James A. Waymire, Henry C. Dibble, Colonel H. I. Kowalsky, Hon. Frank McGowan, and others too numerous to mention. All of these gentlemen have labored unselfishly for the success of their party. And when a party has so many prominent men, such as those whose names we have just mentioned, and whose loyalty to the cause has gained them the love of the entire party throughout the State, we naturally look to the selection of one of their number as the man whom the party can best afford to appoint to do it honor as against the selfish cormorant who seeks to honor himself. Some of the men we mentioned, we think, are justly ambitious and should be recognized, and if the members of the present Legislature should see fit to honor, for instance, the Honorable Samuel M. Shortridge with the position of United States Senator, this State of California would feel that one of its brainiest and manliest representatives had been justly chosen. We purposely select the name of Mr. Shortridge because we have heard him spoken of for this position, and because California would have in him a champion and a defender after her own heart, and one equal to the best talent now occupying like positions from other States. But whoever the Legislature selects, whether one of the gentlemen just mentioned or some other worthy person not yet spoken of, we will feel that it has done much towards striking down a selfish and unworthy man. We feel forced to say in conclusion that no matter who votes for the Honorable George C. Perkins for United States Senator, that there is one man more than others who cannot vote for him and yet maintain his self-respect, letting alone holding the esteem of his friends and neighbors. That man is Judge James A. Waymire.

The Writing On The Wall. It behooves the merchants of this city to bestir themselves if they do not wish to see what little trade is still theirs diverted by the more enterprising cities in this State. We refer more especially to the city of Los Angeles, which is rapidly becoming a rival to San Francisco in more senses of the word than one. That the rivalry is friendly makes it none the less dangerous. A city rises in importance according to the amount of business done in its limits. Its progress is determined by the enterprise and success of its individual merchants. Commercial apathy means ultimate ruin. The NEWS LETTER, while having the interests of all California at heart, is mainly interested in San Francisco and would gladly see it maintain that supremacy which has hitherto been accorded it. We repeat, however, that our title to this supremacy is being undermined by the sister city above mentioned, and unless our business men bestir themselves the commercial laurels may not much longer be ours. While our merchants sit in their dusty offices and complain about hard times, those of Los Angeles are busy attending to business or engaged in drumming it up. While five houses in nearly every one of our blocks are empty and idle, new buildings, imposing and substantially constructed, are springing up everywhere in the sister city. The general feeling about the place is one of energy and bustle and those who complain are usually the idlers found in every community. A message is being writ upon our walls. Will our merchants decipher and understand it in time? Or are they willing that the days of this great city, so rich in glorious possibilities, should be numbered?

There all the Honor Lies. It was a well-earned honor which has just been tendered the Hon. Alexander K. McClure, editor of the Philadelphia Times, in the form of a public dinner, upon his completion of half a century's continuous labor in the field of journalism—a testimonial gained by the most arduous work and most faithful public service. Colonel McClure is secure in the title of the Nestor of Pennsylvania journalism. Indeed, no living editor exceeds his length of service in this country, except Mr. Dana of the New York Sun, and he by only two or three years. Few, living or dead, have completed fifty consecutive years in the same profession. Colonel McClure was born in 1828, and is therefore not an old man yet. His life work was begun by the establishment of a country newspaper in Perry County, Pennsylvania, in 1846. He has lived in a period of the greatest historical importance, and of stupendous achievement in all lines of progress, which gave wide scope to his great ability. The friend and co-worker of Lincoln, of Grant, of the great war Governor Curtin of his own State, and of all the noted men of his time, Colonel McClure and his paper have accepted the full share in the struggles of the nation in war and politics. It was natural, therefore, that Governors, Senators, Congressmen, and public servants generally, should have met to honor him and testify their appreciation of his character. Officers and individuals, policies and parties, have risen in their turn, left their imprint on the pages of history, more or less indelibly, and have passed away since he began the career which has brought him fame and honor, but his paper still remains, a power in our national life, and an evidence of the pre-eminence of his calling over mere politics. One note in his eloquent speech of acknowledgment is the key to his success, and voices a sentiment worthy of the attention of every journalist. He said: "I have long held that the responsible direction of a widely read and respected newspaper is the highest trust under our free Government. I do not thus speak of it to claim for it honors that may be questioned, but to present the oppressive responsibilities which rest upon those who are to-day educating a nation of seventy millions of people under a Government where every citizen is a sovereign, and where the people hold in their own hands the destiny of the greatest republic of the world." Great thoughts are in those few words. The general adoption of their timely suggestions by those who control the press would raise the moral tone of the nation by leaps and bounds. Long may the genial Colonel live to set an example of clean, sturdy, patriotic journalism before his brethren of the pen.

A History-Making Epoch. One who reads the news of the world from day to day, with its gradual movement here and there, scarcely realizes the momentous changes which are taking place. But let him sum up the events of a few years and add those which are transpiring, and he must be impressed with the fact that we are living in a rapid, history-making period. Looking no farther back than the Chinese-Japanese war, let us see what events of importance the short space includes merely in the world's political history. To begin with, we note the development of two Oriental nations into important powers; the absorption of Formosa by Japan, and the independence of Corea. Russia's desire for a better foot-hold on the Pacific, and her jealousy of Japan are prophetic of still greater changes in that region in the near future. It may culminate in a seizure of Chinese territory or a war with Japan, or both. The French are practically forced out of Egypt, and the Sudan is rapidly falling under English rule. Southern and Central Africa are being explored and colonized, while the Madagascar of the Hovas is already a French possession. The concert of Europe has declared that Turkey must sink to the level of a ward of the Powers, with a continual threat of dismemberment hanging over her. The troubles of Spain are no small item in the general shaking up. Cuba, so long her much-abused colony, may try her hand at self-government. The Pearl of the Antilles might have been a polished pearl to-day, instead of the rough gem she is, if her fate had been in the hands of a more progressive power than Spain. The Philippine Islands are another proof of the same truth. There are 1400 of the islands, large and small, with an area of 115,000 square miles. They have a splendid climate, and are capable of vast development. They have belonged to Spain for three centuries, and to-day Spain cannot report their flora and fauna, their geological formation, nor even their population. She may now lose them—it is to be hoped she will—and when she does there will be a lively scramble for them, with Russia and Japan foremost in the race. Spain herself is threatened with revolution at home, and may yet become a Carlist Republic. The fate of Hawaii must soon be settled through American influence. Will it be a Republic, one of the United States, or a county of California? One of these three conditions seems to be its destiny. Before 1900, all the impending changes we have noted must be worked out, with others, perhaps, which have not yet given evidence of their coming. When they are complete, what a stirring history can be written of the comparatively peaceful decade with which the century closes!

MEN WHO POSE AS MINING PROMOTERS.

MINING is again a popular fad in San Francisco, and for the time being every one who can make a connection of some kind with a movement which suggests the possibility of cleaning up a rapid fortune on a magnificent scale does so. Report has it that money is being made in the business, and this is enough to change the occupations of a large portion of the community which never proposes to let a chance escape to make a dollar, provided the chance does not involve any pecuniary outlay upon its own part. All that has to be done now, according to the views of many, is to get control of a piece of mining ground for a nominal sum, and in turn dispose of it to some stranger, who later on is inveigled into the bargain by the promoter whose services have been enlisted for the occasion.

During the coming year it is fondly expected that an army of men in search of California mines will invade the State. This belief is established beyond doubt in the minds of many by the millions which have been changing hands daily of late in mining transactions. It doesn't matter that the bulk of the sales are merely on paper. They loom up large, and that is enough to excite the acquisitive soul hungering after a wealth which has been too long coming in the past. To meet the demand for mines, every hole in the ground from Siskiyou to San Diego has been inspected, and old records have been burnished up in a manner which dims effectually that portion hearing upon failure in the past. If good intentions count for anything, the entire ownership of the State in everything which pertains to mineral deposits will change hands during the coming twelve months.

In order to facilitate matters, new mining companies are now being incorporated at a rate which is astonishing. The incorporators represent all classes, and consist in the main of men who know as much about a mine as it is likely to do about them. The weaving spider, however, is behind each and all of these apparently innocent-looking little associations of honest citizens. The man of affairs controlling the destiny of schemes launches with an airy capital of floating millions, which it is proposed to solidify into cold, hard coin of the republic under the fostering manipulation of the master mind.

A motley crowd, it would appear, were the various occupations of new mining corporations segregated. All trades are represented, and for that matter every walk in life, no matter how humble it may be. Shares take the form of a lottery ticket with the promise of fortune on an equally elaborate scale. A few of the companies represented start out with a bona-fide intention of seeking this fortune by legitimate work, and with chances for success in their case, while the others base their hopes of profit solely upon a sale to some liberally disposed buyer.

The so-called promoters of mining sales here and in all the leading markets of the old and new world are alive to the situation. Voluminous correspondence goes on between them, the objective point in all cases being to provide alluring bait for the trap set for the unwary investor. The latter does not know, of course, that when it comes down to million dollar propositions California, even with all her store of gold, cannot produce more than half-a-dozen mines of the class, and that when they are marketed the itinerant peddler will not be engaged in the sale. For this reason he proves an easy victim to the alluring tales of ready-made bonanzas which do not exist, and turns his fortune over as plunder to the promoter and his clique of assistants.

This city is simply alive with these sharks. Montgomery street is lined with them from early morning until the shadows fall and the mining offices close as a matter of economy in gas bills. Their game is the man from London or the East, the sleek, well-fed looking heavy-weight, who poses as confidential man of world-renowned banking firms. A nod from this great man to one of the hungry-eyed parasites waiting to get an audience, is enough to bring down upon his head an anathema maranatha strong in feeling as it may be in invective.

These imported accessories before the fact in the slaughter of innocents abroad, like any other class of financial operator, can be summed up as good, had, and indifferent, with the good, as usual, in a very hopeless minority. The men of the latter type are difficult to reach.

They are out of range of the mob, and keep there as much as possible. When you meet them you find a gentleman, and one who is well versed in every detail of the business in which he is engaged. He does not find it necessary to air his strong connections abroad, but any statements he may make, or arrangements, can be depended upon.

The pompous, arrogant, self-sufficient, and loud-talking representative of the class can be safely catalogued indifferent. He has just brains enough to make a thorough-going ass of himself, and not enough to make him dangerous to any one but himself. He knows all about mining, and can afford, from his lofty perch of superiority, to sneer at anything which does not suit his views or meet with his approval. This type of promoter is over plentiful just now; mostly foreign; is short-lived, however, fortunately, and apt to get mad at a moment's notice, and kick himself out of the State by mistake, to the satisfaction of all who happened to come in contact with him.

The "had" promoter, as he is now in evidence, is a suave article. With a record for villainy in the past, this species is looked to for the assistance which experience promises in carrying out some nefarious operations. A sneak of the lower order, he can be depended upon just so long as it pays to be true to any side. Mean enough for a spy, tout, or any other qualification of low-class rascality, involving doctored reports, salted mines, with a bogus reputation as a mining expert, the smiling sycophant rubs shoulders with honest men, a living example of unjailed corruption, an offense to public decency and morality. Knowing absolutely nothing of the mining profession by practical experience, and caring less, the sole forte of this predatory scamp is a brazen effrontery which imposes upon his victims, who, carried away by plausible statements of profits in store, only awaken from a spell cast over them to find they have fallen a prey to the slick confidence operator. Sometimes the "had" operator gets involved in the toils of law, but Justice invariably finds him a raw customer to deal with, and he is set free to pursue his way to a fortune which, when attained, is salve enough for a conscience unaffected by the finger of public scorn.

The less harmful type is the gentlemanly-garbed individual of professedly scientific attainments, who comes here backed by a syndicate ready to invest millions upon his word. Some of this class have money supplied them from some quarter, which enables them to travel about in good style, and perfect their education, if inclined that way, by inspecting mines. This very nice position ends, of course, when the mistake is made of approving a property and suggesting its purchase. But, on the other hand, not a few of the class are impecunious, and the first chance for employment affords an opportunity to demand money for expenses. A poor chance is, however, afforded in this State for a game of that kind just now, the honest mine-owner being more interested in raking in cash than in paying any out.

Another hatch of the syndicated advance agents is backed with money by what are known as development companies. The soft point with these gentlemen is a desire to get a showy mining property for a comparatively small sum of money, which will stand inflation for stock-jobbing purposes on the other side—of the Rockies or Atlantic, as the case may be. The elastic proportions of a property of this class is to be gauged entirely by the amount of ore which can be figured up in evidence as a standard for possible dividends in the future. In this way a mine bought at a premium of $500,000 is widened out to a couple of million when it reaches the dearly beloved who provide the necessary funds. The investors in a case of this kind take the chances, it might be added, and the promoters the coin.

In view, therefore, of the vast number of irresponsibles attracted to the business temporarily, it will be wise for the owners of valuable mines to be careful with whom they deal if they intend to take advantage of the opportunities now offering in the market. In the hands of any of our old-time mining men of good repute they are safe. But with strangers, the man who objects to having his credentials scrutinized, and who is unknown, by letter or otherwise, to local hankers or men of prominence, should be ignored, no matter how tempting the proposition he may advance.

JOHN FINLAY.

THE SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY CITRUS FAIR.

THE possibilities of California are being gradually discovered. Last week a grand Citrus Fair was held in Fresno, in which all the counties, from San Joaquin to Kern, were represented in the exhibit of citrus fruits. The Fair was an out-and-out success, and has attracted much attention on account of the fine exhibits made by some of the leading firms of this State. Every county in the San Joaquin Valley was handsomely represented in citrus and other semi-tropic fruits, and a majority of them in great abundance.

The possibilities of this great valley are varied and immense. Fresno County made the first advance in raisin culture, and has kept well to the front. It has become universally recognized as the "Raisin Center." This county has raised and shipped more raisins during the past ten years than all the balance of the State combined, and California is the only State in the Union where they are produced.

Among the many exhibits of raisins, that of the Eagle Packing Company, winner of the first premium at the Columbian Exposition, under the management of Noble Brothers, was most prominent. This firm is responsible for much of Fresno's fame abroad, and one cannot wonder at it, when confronted with such an exhibit of raisins, packed in a variety of excellent styles, and bearing an artistic "Bird of Freedom" as a trade-mark.

Marshall & Wilson, of the Fresno Nursery, were also to the front, with their name and business exquisitely inscribed in dried fruits, on a background of raisins, with a large fruit cross, in imitation of variegated marble, in the center of the design. It bespeaks the quality of their products, and will be sent to the Hamburg Exposition.

A fine display was also made by Serapian Bros. of dried fruits, citrus fruits, and raisins. They are extensive growers, packers, and shippers of these products, and of figs. Their enterprise was illustrated, two years ago, in the starting of overland mule transportation to San Francisco, in opposition to the railroad.

Another handsome exhibit, and one which attracted much attention, was that of the St. George Vineyard. The St. George is one of the oldest, largest, and best appointed wineries in the State, and the wine produced there is rapidly becoming a favorite, owing to the undeviating qualities of purity and general excellence.

The Citrus Fair has done much to advertise California in a legitimate manner, and its promoters deserve a large amount of praise for the untiring energy they displayed, and which has made of the Fair an unqualified success.

ONE of the public benefactors of Los Angeles has lately been visiting this city. This gentleman is Mr. G. J. Griffith, who gave that city what is probably the largest park in the world, as it comprises over 3000 acres. The park lies one mile north of the north line of Los Angeles, and is an absolutely ideal spot. The gift was a most generous one, as the land is worth a fortune in itself. Mr. Griffith, however, is a gentleman whose enterprise has made him the possessor of millions, and this last gift will gain for him the love of an entire city. One stipulation made with the gift is that no car line running to the park shall be allowed to charge more than five cents for each trip. It will thus become the most popular of all the recreation grounds of beautiful Los Angeles. It is to be hoped that Mr. Griffith will be permitted a long life to enjoy the popularity he has so justly earned.

Eastward Through The Rockies.

The traveler, tourist, or business man is wise when he selects the Rio Grande Western Railway "Great Salt Lake Route" for his route to the East. It is the only trans-continental line passing directly through Salt Lake City, and in addition to the glimpse it affords of the Teuple City, the Great Salt Lake, and the picturesque Salt Lake and Utah Valleys, it offers the choice of three distinct routes through the mountains and the most magnificent scenery in the world. Double daily train service and through Pullman and Tourist sleeping cars between Los Angeles, San Francisco, Denver, and Chicago. Mouday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, of each week, Pullman Tourist cars are run from Los Angeles to Boston via Chicago, without change.

For pamphlets descriptive of the "Great Salt Lake Route," write W. H. SNEDAKER, General Agent, 14 Montgomery Street.

NO leader of cotillions, manager of private theatricals and frequent diner-out is more popular in society circles than big Ray Sberman who a few years ago, in addition to his social accomplishments, was the football idol of the State University. During part of the Christmas holidays he was a guest at a Marin County house party. On the morning fixed for his return to the city, while wearing a new suit of tweed, made expressly for this visit and somewhat hurriedly put together, he had the misfortune in vaulting over a fence, to split open a long seam in his trousers. The only other costume he had with him was his evening dress, and he could not very well travel homeward in his swallow-tail coat, especially as he was to accompany two young ladies, who were also guests at the same house. During his college days Ray had in emergencies, learned to use his needle, so hurrying to his room, he gathered together the ends of the rent and sewed it up as best he could. This amateur expedient served its purpose so long as Sherman remained in a standing position. But, having neglected to insert a piece of cloth in the rent, when he took his seat in the carriage to be driven to the train, he was horrified to bear an ominous report like the breaking up of a glacier in the spring.

"What's that?" asked one of the startled girls.

Ray knew only too well that the long seam had reopened, but he tried to look unconscious and suggested that it was probably the effect of the rain on the trees. He had no overcoat to cover the weak spot in his armor, so he had to stand up against the wall of the little railway station and when the party boarded the train, Sherman backed away from the train with the politeness of a Chesterfield of the old school. That trip to town was a memorable one to the wretched Ray, and aged him more than the invention of forty new figures for the German. His misery was partially alleviated when on the ferry he fortunately encountered a friend, whom he forcibly despoiled of an overcoat to hide the cause of his woe. The worst of it all was that the girls somehow discovered the cause of their escort's unhappiness and the story was too good to keep. They smile now when Sherman boldly turns his back and walks calmly away from them.

One peculiarity about Willie K. Ball, the art connoisseur and society favorite, is his delight in accomplishments which are usually deemed purely feminine. He uses the needle and the crochet hook deftly, and frequently presents to admiring lady friends samples of his skill in fine sewing and embroidery. As may be imagined, these idiosyncracies do not generally endear Ball to men at first glance, although he has a wide circle of intimates whom he periodically invites to entertainments at his rooms. He gave a holiday card party, at which a dozen men were present, and when the throats of all were parched with many cigarettes, his historian relates that Ball produced a one quart bottle of beer, while two dozen eyes anxiously followed the movements of the host. Placing the bottle on the table with a bang, Willie turned to his guests in a spirit of true hospitality.

"See here," he said. "This is Christmas week, and you fellows don't get home until you drink every drop of that."

"Peck" Eppinger is chiefly remarkable for the good times he has, and the young merchant obtained his soubriquet in the gay Bohemian circles which he frequents. He celebrated one particular night of the holidays in right royal style, and every individual who crossed his path quaffed champagne at "Peck's" expense. His culminating act of entertainment was the scattering of gold coins among the scrambling crowd who surrounded his carriage as he started from one resort to another. As he was about to depart, a policeman thoughtlessly appeared on the scene, and as "Peck" considered this intrusion a personal reflection, he displayed such forcible resentment that the cop uninvited entered Eppinger's carriage and accompanied him, despite his protests, to the nearest police station. After the little matter of bailing him out had been accomplished through the offices of a faithful friend, the latter ordered the cabman to drive directly to the Eppinger home. "Peck" objected so strenuously to this arrangement that his friend was constrained to break "Peck's" walking stick over its owner's head, which discipline reduced the festive Eppinger to as meek a state of compliance as could be desired. With an aching head and an indistinct recollection of the manner in which he had received his injuries, on the following day "Peck" sought out his good Samaritan and requested his company to police headquarters.

"What do you want to go there again for?" asked the astonished friend. "Haven't you had enough? You take my advice, and give the police a wide berth."

"Oh, I am going to prefer charges against the cop," replied "Peck."

"What for?" was the disgusted query.

"For clubbing me over the head in the carriage," rejoined "Peck," innocently, rubbing his head with a tender hand.

It is reasonably certain that the Police Commissioners will never be called upon to investigate that particular charge of clubbing against the patrolman.

Governor Budd has never been suspected of possessing a forgiving spirit, and it is his boast that he forgets an injury only when he has repaid his enemy with liberal interest. He has squared up most of his debts of malice, but he sorrowfully admits that there is one big account upon which he still occupies the wrong side of the ledger. During the gubernatorial campaign two years ago, nothing caused Budd so great perturbation as the "Nancy" cartoons drawn by that cynical artist, Clarence Webster. Budd never encountered the artist, although when the bloom is on the rye, he has frequently expressed in ferocious language a strong desire for a personal interview with Webster in a sealed apartment. At a holiday dinner given in San Francisco, the Governor was seated next to a mild-looking, spectacled gentleman, who proved a most entertaining table companion. The Governor had failed to catch the name of his neighbor, who told quaint stories with the dry wit which has given the artist-humorist high rank as a raconteur. As the dinner ended, Budd expressed his gratification at meeting his witty companion, and begged to inquire his name.

"Webster," demurely replied that gentleman.

"And your business?" continued the Chief Executive of the State.

"Newspaper artist," said Webster, with imperturbable gravity. Noting Budd's savage look of interrogation, he continued serenely: "Yes, I drew those cartoons you are thinking about."

The Governor's face was a study. He felt he had been caught in a trap, and that some courtesy had been squeezed out of him under false pretences. He turned the famous Stockton purple hue and almost foamed at the mouth. He struggled with himself for several minutes, and then exploded.

"Well," he finally roared, banging his fist upon the table, "I suppose it's a case of every man to his trade, but I'm damned if I like yours!"

Oh, wonderful figures have they—
These nymphs of the flying ballet!

To see them o' nights

In their neatly filled tights

Is worth all the fee that we pay.

As an ocular vision they seem

A beautiful flesh-and-blood dream,

But nobody knows

What those tights would disclose

Should the tell-tale X-ray on them gleam!

As odd a Christmas gift as ever left this State was sent East last week by Mr. Alfred V. La Motte, who owns a large vineyard at Glen Ellen, and also writes articles on horticultural topics at his office in this city. He dearly loves a practical joke, and, in his time, has played some pretty pranks at the expense of his friends. Mr. La Motte is much interested in immigration, which he labors hard to promote, and, incidentally, it may be stated that he is one of the best-informed men in the State on California's resources and possibilities. In the furtherance of his plans to attract desirable settlers, he writes many letters to Eastern residents. One of his correspondents seemed to have an insatiable thirst for information about California, and, as soon as Mr. La Motte had answered one batch of questions, along would come another series of queries, with hypercritical comments on the facts as they were sent to him.

Mr. La Motte became very tired of his correspondent, realizing that he was simply wasting his time. The climax came when the Eastern man wrote recently, asking if it were true that Californians were preyed upon by particularly vicious fleas. La Motte replied that this was a big State, inhabited by big people, and turning out big products, with fleas of proportionate size to the magnificent dimensions of everything else. He had just found on his ranch a ground insect two inches long, resembling the flea in form, but of quite different habits and pursuits. The Mexicans call it "the deer killer," from a legend that, when deer sleep, it bores into their ears and causes death. For his correspondent's better information, he forwarded this formidable-looking insect as a specimen of the California flea, attaching it to a bit of cardboard labeled "with the compliments of the season." Mr. La Motte chuckles to himself as he pictures the horror of his correspondent at sight of the mammoth "flea." This object lesson probably constitutes the closing chapter of that correspondence.

At the recent Horse Show, many curious eyes peeped into the stall of the brown broodmare, Tone, winner of first prize in her class. Horsemen accorded her the close inspection and homage due "the mother of a record-breaker," for Tone has earned that enviable distinction and a lasting place in turf history as the dam of Agitato, 2:09½, holder of the world's record for three-year-old pacers. Agitato's brilliant campaign on the Montana and California circuits is a matter of great pride to John F. Boyd, owner of Tone, and, from all appearances, Mr. Boyd will continue to produce such racing phenomenons. His "Owyhee" (by Charles Derby, 2:20) also a blue-ribbon winner at the show, went through the circuit last summer without losing a single heat, and took a record of 2:24, becoming, thereby, the champion two-year-old trotter of the Pacific Coast for 1896. Among the pacers at the exhibition, Mr. Boyd's two-year-old, "Kawookum," attracted general attention. He is brother to the great Diablo, who had a record of 2:09½ as a four-year-old. In the yearling class, Mr. Boyd exhibited the most promising youngster of the year, royally bred and perfectly proportioned, viz., Goodway, a bay colt by Steinway, and brother to Charles Derby, the sire of Diablo, Owyhee, and Kawookum. Barring accident, he will add to the laurels already won by Oakwood Park Stock Farm. The blue ribbon in the two-year-old filly class properly went to Oakwood Belle. She appropriately takes her name from the farm, and a more stylish Miss never walked in aristocratic horsedom.

John F. Boyd's mining career, a part of the State's successful history, bids fair to be surpassed by his horse-breeding operations. On his Oakwood Park Stock Farm, in Contra Costa County, are horses rich in the most valued blood lines of the standard-bred trotter; lines that make the production of an Agitato or a Diablo, reasonably certain. These blood lines, too, are found transmitting their qualities of speed and stamina to the superb style of the carriage horses, bred by Mr. Boyd.

Of all the banquet halls in the city that of the Maison Riche is undoubtedly the finest. The accommodations are perfect and the service excellent, and the largest functions can be held there.

The Book For the last four or five years Mr. I. Zangwill of will has contributed to the Pall Mall Maga-
The Week* zine a department entitled "Without Prejudice," in which he has commented on men, women, life, manners, and literature. Such of these comments as do not depend upon the books, plays, or pictures of others, he has gathered together into this volume. In the course of these essays he is humorous, witty, sarcastic, caustic, paradoxical, and heterodoxical, but never dull.
Though he uses the phrase "without prejudice," he does not wish it to be understood that he has no positive convictions. He very truly says that to the common man every strong statement that does not tally with his own invertebrate ignorance seems to be a prejudiced one;
whereas on the lips of a man of intelligence and culture it is the utterance of conviction upon good grounds and mature reflection. Prejudice is an unreasoning pre-possession for or against a thing or person; postjudice is something quite different. Open the book where one will, one is struck by the insight and level-headedness everywhere displayed. Among other aspects of this wide and wicked world Mr. Zangwill has carefully observed table-turning, spirit rapping, the planchette, and other phenomena of "Borderland," and analyses them in a clear and convincing manner. He makes it plain that, though he may now and then have yielded to these "intellectual whoredoms" (to borrow an apt phrase of Mr. Mallock), he has never permitted his will or his intelligence to be debauched by them. Like most clever men, Mr. Zangwill is not averse to raising the hair of the hyper-pious by taking an ancient and venerable maxim and standing it upon its head. To this another very brilliant man—Oscar Wilde—was much addicted, and many amusing examples of this tendency are to be found in his volume of essays entitled "Intentions," but with Wilde paradox making had become a trick and degenerated into a mannerism. In Zangwill's writing the paradox merely flashes across the page like a streak of forked lightning, startling us by its sudden glare. On pages 140 and 141 of this volume is a letter addressed by Zangwill to Wilde parodying the latter's style, in the course of which he says: "I say these things to make it quite clear to you that I speak to you more in anger than in sorrow. You are much too important to be discussed seriously, and if I take the trouble to give you advice, it is only because I am so much younger than you." All who are familiar with Wilde's style will acknowledge this to be an excellent imitation.
In a little two-page essay on "The Franchise Farce" our author falls foul of the capitalists who defend bribery on the ground that universal suffrage is so great a menace to the safety and well-being of the community that it becomes necessary to nullify it by universal corruption. He justly says that to enfranchise the negro and then to render his vote nugatory by false counting is to set up a double standard of morals, which infects the whole nation, and spreads into every department of the national life.
The kind of corrupt thinking thus engendered was very clearly shown at the recent Presidential election, when millions of voters proved their willingness to repudiate half of the nation's debts, and spend the nation's money in buying silver from its producers at twice the market value. The remarks "Concerning General Elections," "In Defence of Gambling," on "Art in England," "Love in Life and Literature," are all lively, attractive, and full of suggestion. Zangwill seems to have quite shaken off all prejudice (in the unfavorable sense), and to see things straight and clear, in their true relations: he does not seem to be the victim of excess of patriotism, race-feeling, bias for or against revealed religion, or any form of un-reason whatever. Like all persons of intelligence and insight, he is at heart an aristocrat, that is, he thinks that the foolish people are, at present, in a terribly overwhelming majority all around and about us in the wide world, and that it can never be right that the foolish should rule the wise.

* Without Prejudice. By I. Zangwill, New York: the Century
Co. Price $1.50.

In an essay on "The influence of names" Mr. Zangwill elaborates an ingenious theory that a large proportion of eminent writers in English have an "r" in their names.
If you run through the authors' names that come into your mind you will be surprised how often the fateful "r" appears. Among dead novelists alone think of Thackeray, Charles Dickens, Walter Scott, Charles Reade, George
Eliot (Marian Evans), Bulwer Lytton, Charlotte Bronte (Currer Bell), Trollope, Disraeli. Kate Douglas Wiggin, having acquired the necessary "r" by becoming Mrs.
Riggs, has published her first long story, "Marm Lisa," in which she manifests an intimate acquaintance with kindergarten work, and much sympathy with young children. Mrs. S. Cora Grubb, the foolish, ignorant, hysterical creature, who attends to everything but her obvious duties, and hemuddles her pate with cheiromancy, astrology, theosophy, Christian science, Edenism, hypnotism, spiritualism, and every vain thing imagined by the incurably feeble-minded, is capitally drawn. The poor, half-idiotic Lisa, under the fostering care of Mistress Mary and her kind assistants, is rescued from her mental darkness, and in the crowning episode of the book displays positive heroism. The story is well written and the interest is sustained to the very end.

Marm Lisa, by Kate Douglas Wiggin. Houghton Mifflin & Co.
Boston and New York. 1897. Price, $1.

It is amusing to observe the ideas of propriety entertained by the editors of different magazines. In the November issue of a certain five-cent periodical there appeared a cut of Miss Cissy Fitzgerald from a photograph by Sarony of New York, in which that sprightly young person appears with her right leg gayly thrown over her left, incidentally displaying a good deal of black stocking and white lace. In the December issue of another five-cent magazine appears a reproduction of the same photograph, with the offending limb and the shocking lace cut off, but still showing the skirts thrown up.
Yet probably both these editors would readily enough press past the doorkeeper of the theatre to see the actual leg (to say nothing of the vivacious Cissy's wicked wink), from the reproduction of a picture of which as a magazine cut one of them at any rate shrinks. Again: a popular ten-cent magazine famous for its reproductions of photographs of actresses, and of pictures displaying the female form as nearly nude as possible, recently sent back to us as "hardly proper for reproduction" some photographs of South Sea Island women, which were afterwards reproduced in a 25-cent magazine devoted to the cause of home education, edited by a Doctor of Divinity, and contributed to by some of the best known writers of the day.

Messrs. Gelett Burgess and Porter Garnett have consolidated themselves into a publishing firm, and are about to issue "Seen and Unseen; or the Monologues of a Homeless Snail," a collection of songs by a young Japanese gentleman named Yone Noguchi. He is a graduate of the University of Tokio, and was for some time secretary to the Editor of a Tokio magazine. He has written articles in his own tongue on California scenery, and has edited a newspaper for his countrymen in this city. Much of his time in California has been spent upon Joaquin Miller's ranch, where he rambles, dreams, and writes. The new firm intends soon to issue a "hi-weekly" review, to be entitled "Phyllida, or the Milkmaid," and to be devoted to literary topics, short essays, and the doings of town and country. Whether we are to expect the periodical to appear once in two weeks, or twice a week, it is impossible to say. The term "hi-monthly" involves the same ambiguity, but in that case it is easily avoided by the use of "fortnightly," which can mean nothing else but once in fourteen nights.

Mrs. Anna Bowman Dodd, author of a pleasant, gossipy, if rather gushing little book describing visits to several cathedrals in the West and South of England, is about to publish a volume, the scene of which is laid in that curious and little known region, the Broads of Norfolk. The book is to be published by the Macmillan Co., and adorned with many sketches by Joseph Pennell. It will, doubtless, present an interesting picture of a remarkable part of old England, that is full of quaint characters.

"Washington's Prophetic Vision of the Coming War," issued by the Golden Gate Promoting Company, is an account of how San Francisco was saved from being destroyed by the Japanese fleet. The deus ex machina is General Sir Patrick McDermott of the British Army, who lets fall from flying machines little original packages of high explosives upon the decks of the enemy's battleships. We do not know exactly what the company which publishes this brochure intends to promote, but that it is not the writing of good English may be gathered from a single sentence describing the condition of San Francisco in 1899. "The affiliated colleges and the great Sutoro library were now attended by the studious youth, and the vanity fair, the mental acrobat, and the beautiful display of the lovely sex." How a library can be attended by a fair, and a college by a display, is not clear. For the rest the production is poorly and inaccurately printed, and contains many minor errors and absurdities.

A calendar for 1897 has been prepared by N. W. Ayer & Son, the newspaper advertising agents, of Philadelphia, which is the most useful of the many we have seen thus far. The dates are printed in large type and can be read across a room, and its general handsome appearance makes it worthy a place in any library or office. For the sum of 25 cents this calendar will be sent, securely packed, to any address in the country.

The Christmas number of the Los Angeles Capital was a beauty in every sense of the word. It reflects much credit upon those in charge, and will undoubtedly be appreciated in other places besides Los Angeles.

THE successful transmission of electric power from Newcastle to Sacramento, a distance of thirty miles, is one of the most notable events of the month in California. At Newcastle the electric energy is generated from the water power of the South Yuba Canal Company. A few years ago such long distance transmission of electricity for power purposes was regarded as wholly impracticable. Now that the contrary has been abundantly demonstrated, the prospect is that with improved appliances and increased knowledge of electrical phenomena, much of the water power now idle will be employed to advantage in this way.

MOST of the efforts to set aside wills, upon the ground of undue influence, prove abortive. It is a sound principle of the law that undue influence is not to be presumed unless unfair advantage has manifestly been taken of some relation of trust and confidence by the beneficiaries of the contested instrument. If men and women are not to be allowed to do with their property as they may see fit, wills would better be abolished.

IT is related that a Jew and a Christian once argued with each other so candidly, as to the merits of their respective faiths, that at the close of the discussion the Jew became a Christian and the Christian a Jew. This has been regarded as a joke, but Professor Howison insists that a certain learned Rabbi is in reality a Christian, while, on the other hand, the Rabbi is equally positive that the Professor's so-called Christian philosophy is nothing more than Judaism. Thus extremes meet.

NOWHERE in the world will be found so beautiful a Park as to that to which we can lay claim. Our illustration this week shows one especially picturesque spot in it, the Huntington Falls, with its placid lake sheltered from the wind, where one can enjoy an hour's boating. The dreamy beauty of the place must be seen to be fully appreciated.

Ideal Champagne.

With due deference to the well-known fastidious proclivities of California Champagne consumers, Messrs. Moët & Chandon, who, as is well known, are the largest vineyard owners in the Champagne, have concluded to ship henceforth their renowned "White Seal Grande Cuvee" to this Coast. This brand is celebrated as a great favorite among the select circles in London and other large cities in Europe, it being a clean and deliciously dry wine, and the "White Seal Grande Cuvee" is also bound to become popular here with people of a discriminating palate.

"We obey no wand but pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

HERE is a Paris correspondent's account of the Divine Sarah in a new measure of immortality: "Lorenzo the Degenerate, or Lorenzoaccio de Medicis is from first to last, as given at the Renaissance, un article de Paris. I mean the characters, for the accessories are purely Renaissance and Florentine. Perhaps it is as well that whim and fancy should predominate in the personations—or rather personation, for there is but one player in the drama, Mme. Sarah Bernhardt. She is stage manager, star, everything; the others are merely well-broken-in foils. Musset's drama has been so adapted for her as to be a monologue, broken by answers or observations to serve as rests, or bring out more clearly the drift of the play. During these pauses for the title-role, Lorenzo glides stealthily into corners. Lorenzoaccio is neither he, she, nor it, but an oblique, enigmatic third-sex being, who never shows himself plainly until the drop-curtain scene. And then one feels that one only knows about a few of his vices. The rest are still his own secret. In this part Sarah Bernhardt is a curious creature—interesting, fascinating, though slightly sickening. There is a good deal of the leopard or the panther in her graceful ways and remorseless ferocity. She is through and through corrupt and immoral; but no more conscious of her state than if she were a feline of the desert.

"It is marvelous how a single player can fill the four acts, and in a drama with a chief character who is all dissimulation. There are only here and there a few outbursts of genuine feeling. The revelation of the scheme in which the whole plot lies is less than gradual. If there were passionate outbursts and thrilling by-play, the drama would miss its mark. Besides, Lorenzo is not only an Italian, but a Florentine. He would not let his own mother divine his thoughts. When soliloquizing, he remembers that walls have ears.

"Another of the difficulties surmounted is having to wear a single costume from the beginning of the first act to the close of the drop-curtain scene. I think Sarah Bernhardt plumper than she used to be. The make-up of her face gives her a striking resemblance to Sir Henry Irving, with a something that reminds one of Sardou. Her ambition is to out-Irving Irving in a transposition of his Hamlet to the key of Lorenzoaccio, and by keeping close to him—without exactly copying him—in plastic poses, get-up, expression, mannerisms, and the show of an all-absorbing personality. Mme. Bernhardt is a she or third-sex Irving, or a transubstantiation of Sir Henry, whimsical, curious, amusing in a subtle way, and by no means caricatural. The hair of the great actress this time is cut short, in the Florentine sixteenth-century fashion, but clusters round the forehead. The doublet fits like a jersey, and the haggly shorts have a petticoatish air akin to knickers, though they do not descend farther than half-way to the knees."

I do not feel myself in the proper mood to grapple with the theatrical past of '96. The Christmas shows have lost me my balance and authority. I joy in a spectacular present glittering with sleek, shimmering seraphim. There are heavier pens than mine to make statistics of the dead. Out of a town full of ballets, I choose the Orpheum for my flowers. There the hallet bids fair to carry the holiday spirit some weeks into the new year. It was a tremendous undertaking for Manager Walter, engaging these fifty or more dancers and their directors, in addition to the otherwise expensive show billed, but the venture has been a success from every standpoint, and it is, perhaps, the best advertisement the Orpheum has ever had. Whatever little irregularities in the lights and the dancers, which may have marred the opening performance, are now, happily, nowise in evidence. Kiralfy has instilled immeasurable ginger in the girls; they dance with splendid enthusiasm, even wildly at times, and yet there is discipline, surety, and a well-balanced picture in the ensemble.

The flying hallet is, of course, a question of mechanism and effects, and of more interest as a novelty than as a serious phase of hallet work, but it enhances illusion, and gives graceful sky effect to the stage picture.

Ahachi and Maschand do a remarkable acrobatic turn, and the three Misses Dunbar, besides assisting in the hallet, still sing their coster songs, and expose their little spectacular panties.

Jack and the Beanstalk has made a surprisingly big hit at the Tivoli, where, from all appearances, it will be continued several weeks to come. There are less gags than usual, and more crisp music, and the transformation scene is of particular brilliancy and beauty. All the favorites and several new people are in the cast.

The popular Frawleys have put in a busy holiday week with three of their last season's plays, His Wife's Father, The Great Unknown, and Men and Women, all of which have been reviewed in earlier issues of the NEWS LETTER. Sunday night's performance of Men and Women closes the Frawley engagement at the Columbia.

Denman Thompson's rural classic, The Old Homestead, comes to the Baldwin Monday night. I have not seen the cast, but the press-agent says, "it is the strongest that has ever enacted this pretty ideal of New England life; and its musical features, being rendered by a selected choir of twenty trained voices, adds greatly to the charm. By playing at the Baldwin The Old Homestead not only offers luxurious seats and surroundings to the average theatre-goer who loves this old play, but it will give society in general, and country-club people in particular, a delightful picture of rustic life."

Next week the bill at the Orpheum will be further strengthened by four new acts, prominent among which is Hallen and Fuller, in a comedy sketch, An Artist and His Model. The first-mentioned name is that of our old farce-comedy friend, Fred Hallen, of Hallen and Hart fame. The second is Mollie Fuller, his wife. The other new people are: Miss Anna Caldwell, singing comedienne; the two Bostons, English eccentricities, and Charles Wayne, late of Lillian Russell's company, in a monologue.

While it may be disclosing some of the many surprises Mr. Joseph Murphy has in store for the Columbia patrons, I cannot resist publishing in full this little prose poem, which I have just received from his press agent:

Let any blasé patron of the theatre who remembers seeing Joseph Murphy in his Irish play, Shaun Rhue, ten or a dozen years ago, see the same actor to-day in the same play, and he will probably leave the theatre when the curtain comes down on the last act, and not before. More than that, he will find his way homeward, meditating and wondering how it is that Mr. Murphy has retained his youthful good looks, his graceful legs, and nimble feet, and his sweet, strong, manly singing voice. It is a conundrum that can only be answered by proving that it is true as stated, just as Mr. Murphy presents the proof each time he appears as Larry Donovan and Shaun Rhue. The rendition of the song, "A Handful of Earth," by Larry, while kneeling at his mother's grave, after having been driven away from his home, is a benediction.

Mr. Murphy will commence a fortnight's engagement at the Columbia on Monday, presenting for the first week Shaun Rhue. The regular popular prices of the Columbia will prevail.

AS we go to press news comes to us of the death of Joseph B. McCullagh, editor-in-chief of the St. Louis Daily-Globe Democrat. Mr. McCullagh worked his way up from a reporter to the responsible position he occupied at the time of his death. He had been ailing for some time and for the last few days had edited his paper from the sick room. A more able all-round newspaper man never lived, and the excellence of his paper was largely due to his untiring efforts.

THE late J. Ross Jackson, who expired in this city last Wednesday, was one of the best known newspaper men on the Coast. Of late years he had retired from active journalism but still kept in touch with his old associates, by all of whom he will long be mourned.

THE PLEASURES OF RUIN.

TO the philosophical mind—and it is really marvelous how philosophical one can become under adversity—there are certain compensating advantages in the state of ruin, which, if not quite so intense as the pleasures of Hope, or Memory, or Imagination, do much to reconcile us to the change in our circumstances. The first feeling is one of extreme relief that the whole thing is over and we are out of suspense. The smash has come; writs and attachments have blossomed into sheriff's officers and the auctioneer, whose fell and inexorable hammer has made short work of our goods and chattels; our wealthy friends have said just what we expected, and Brown, who used to look dinners and twenty-dollar pieces at us whenever he met us before, now crosses over to the opposite side of the street. The cheap lodgings in the shady neighborhood have become stern and ineradicable facts, and we can look about us at last and endeavor to make the best of the position. But now you have a newly-acquired sense of freedom, to which, perhaps, you have long been a stranger. It is no longer a question whether you shall die at Delmouico's or the Maison Riche, but in all probability the choice will lie—if your taste still inclines to the French menu, of the diner de jour of six courses for twenty-five cents, or, if your fancy lies more in the American style, one of the popular-price restaurants, three dishes for a quarter. No longer will the varying merits of chicken gumbo, or turtle soup, salmon mayonnaise, and aspic of lobster, truffled turkey, and oyster stuffed capon come between you and your night's rest. Again, your present circumstances are such that you are no longer harassed by the touters for subscriptions, male and female, and, therefore, you find it needless to discuss the comparative merits of the claims put forward by the friends of the Cannibal Islanders for Worcestershire sauce, or by the friends of the Mayor of Milpitas for a drinking fountain, to be placed in the plaza in honor of that distinguished grocer and municipal chief.

When you go to the theatre or opera you are no longer compelled to pay fifty or a hundred per cent. for the privilege of receiving your ticket from an agent, and you go to the gallery, where, if the peanuts and lager beer are a bit of a nuisance at first, you soon get accustomed to it; at any rate, you are permitted to hear the play without being bored by one of Brown's "good stories" during the prima donna's chief aria, or while the eminent tragedian is giving some fine piece of declamation.

In fact, you discover sources of gratuitous amusement which indifference has, hitherto, hidden from you. Instead of the sojourn at B'lingham or Del Moute, you enjoy yourself with the attractions at the Park, at Sutro Heights, or a five-cent ride to Ingleside, and a stroll along the Alameda from there to the beach, or, if your fancy takes you across the bay, a day at Leona Heights, where you can enjoy the fresh air, which you will come to think as pleasant as at Santa Cruz or at other resorts you may have been in the habit of visiting at a much greater distance from the city.

But the time when you do really enjoy the "Pleasures of Ruin" is when that exquisite moment comes—which it will, sooner or later, when a temporary, or it may be a permanent, change in your fortunes takes place. If you are an author, your book has found a publisher; if an artist, your picture a buyer; or some one pays up an old debt, or some distant relative mentions your name in his will. Whatever it may be, the keen appreciation of the benefits we formerly enjoyed, which our vicissitudes have taught us, and the knowledge we have acquired of the dingier side of nature, give a remarkable zest to our return to a brighter life. And if a man has good health and spirits he will find that it is as true that "hope springs eternal in the human breast" as that when things are at their worst they mend; and, if he be of an extra-hopeful disposition, he will welcome the increased depression of his fortunes as a sure forerunner of a change of luck.

Climate warm.

THE sentiment of the Irrigation Congress in Arizona was practically unanimous that the arid lands of the great West must be reclaimed. This idea has often been repeated of late years. The great difficulty in the way of its accomplishment is the lack of water. But it is proposed that Congress cede the arid lands to the States, respectively, and that loans from the National Treasury, or of the National credit, to the extent of a million dollars to each State, be made for the purpose of reclaiming the ceded lands. It is a great scheme, with magnificent opportunities for jobs.

THE improvement of our navigable rivers, by means of dredging, debris dams, levees, cut-offs and other means, with incidental aid to hydraulic mining, is to be one of the most important matters before the Legislature this winter. The Sacramento river, in particular, calls for attention. It should be practicable, at this late day, to unite upon a scheme advantageous to all concerned.

IF, as Congressman Loud contends, it costs the Government from $20,000,000 to $40,000,000 a year to carry serial novels and "sample copy" newspapers in the mails, there is need of amending the postal laws. The carriage of mail matter at a cost of twelve cents a pound, with a charge to the public of only one cent, would appear to be bad business.

CHICAGO is reaching out energetically for the trade of Cuba. It might be well for San Francisco to put forth a little effort in the same direction.

The house of Rothschild is about the best advertised and the most badly abused firm in Europe. The name alone, like that of the Old

The Expansion System Again at Work.

Lady of Treadneedle street, is the synonym for financial solidity the world over, and, in connection with man or institution, a sufficient sponsor for millions. Five out of every ten of the grandees who land in this town with a bounce and swagger in miningdom manage to have it leak out in the early stages of the game that they expect the homage due to agents of the great European financiers, who in this way are held responsible unwittingly by innumerable shortcomings and absurdities, about which they are never likely to learn unless by sheer accident. Like the Rat-catcher to Her Britannic Majesty, it is easy for any one to pose as agent on the lookout for a mine for the Rothschilds. Like all bankers and financial men of standing abroad, they are approachable on business matters minus the ceremony attached to an interview with newly-gilded gingerbread in more modern communities, and it only requires money to tap a wire at any moment; so that, unless it comes to an actual showdown of credentials, it is a difficult matter to detect the fraud who may have the courtesy of a correspondent from this widely-respected firm without being upon friendly, let alone confidential, relations with it. These remarks are suggested by the way in which the firm was dragged into the Iron Mountain deal this week, in an utterly unwarranted manner.

The story referred to goes on to tell the good people of California about a tremendous deal which has just been concluded here, involving the payment of $5,000,000 by the Rothschilds for the Iron Mountain mine of Shasta, which is accredited with being a copper deposit of more or less magnitude, according to the manner in which the description impresses the reader. The reason ascribed for this exciting move on the part of the London bankers is that they believe gold is about to be dethroned to make room on the top perch for copper. This whoop-up, with its 1800 additional men at work attachment, has been occasioned by the fact that some changes are about to be made in the construction of the English company which transformed the old Iron Mountain mine of Squaw Creek by purchase, some two years ago, into the Mountain Mines, Limited, of Keswick, California, with head offices at No. 3 Lombard street, London, E. C. The Mathesons of London were the prime movers in the enterprise, and the connection of the Rothschild house is due to its business relations with this firm in the control of giant copper-producing mines in Spain. The new company has expended a large sum of money at Keswick (named after a director of the company), probably in the neighborhood of $500,000, erecting smelters and constructing a railroad. The property cost, at the outside, $250,000, in the first place, of which the original owners only got in the neighborhood of $150,000, the balance being paid out to make a couple of promoters comfortable for life. This runs the total cost of the ground and works up to $750,000, or perhaps a little more—within $1,000,000 in any event.

Copper Crowned Metallic King.

These figures are small, ranged alongside of those of the new Mountain Copper Company, which has now absorbed the Shasta mines and property of the Mountain Mines, furnishing an object lesson for the former owners of the old Iron Mountain and other mining men of California of what the British promoter can achieve when he starts in. The share capital of the new concern amounts in round numbers to $6,250,000, including the purchase price of what is described as the New Jersey Metal Refining Works, situate at Elizabeth, in the State of New Jersey. This must be a gigantic institution of its kind, judging from the fact that, allowing the exceedingly liberal estimate of $1,000,000 for the Keswick property, the sum of $5,250,000 is involved in the purchase of its plant. As an industrial enterprise, the promoters, who are evidently wise in their generation, will doubtless have little difficulty in raising the money they ask, eliminating as they are in a position to do, to a certain extent at least, the chances of mining. In view of the facts, however, it is difficult to recognize any warrant for the local announcement that the Messrs. Rothschild had invested $5,000,000 in the purchase of the California mines. The tendency to exaggeration in all matters pertaining to mining at present is not calculated to benefit the industry. It creates a bad impression abroad among people who know the true facts of the case, and disturbs confidence among investors.

A Cautious Market For Gold Mines.

Mining operators of all degree in this part of the world had better disabuse their minds of the idea that London and Paris are ready to fall over head and heels in love with anything they may feel disposed to hurl at the natives. Who ever tells them so may mean well, but he does not know more than the law allows about the situation in either city. As a matter of fact, investors are more than ordinarily cautious in both of these burghs, and merit alone is sufficient to attract even investigation. Paris is absolutely dull for all mining investments, the indifference of buyers being due entirely to the actions of promoters in forcing business beyond the sustaining power of the market which is now suffering from a bad attack of indigestion. London promoters are loaded down temporarily with industrial ventures, which are now the fad, so that little is done in foreign mines beyond arranging for a coup or two in spring, when it is thought the public can be trusted to absorb a few shares which promise a fair working profit. At present, efforts are limited in this line to working off a few stocks of small concerns in Scotland and the provinces.

A Local Mining Development Company.

The Pacific Coast Mining Agency Company has blossomed out during the week, in the object of carrying on the purchase and sale of mines on an elaborate scale. The names of the men who stand sponsor for the reputation of the concern are well-known in the manufacturing and financial world, and in this respect the proposition is above reproach. The only trouble likely to arise is that the other manufacturers of mining machinery in this city may feel that their business prospects are jeopardized by a formidable rival of this kind, which is not making a new departure of the kind for the good of its promoter's health. If all the varied business interests connected with the mining industry get banded together in cliques to control the situation from the grass roots up, as well as down, we will have some lively times in town. The mine-owner certainly will not be the loser in the competition for trade, if the promoter does. In Horatio Beveridge the new company has a manager who understands the ropes, with foreign connections which should prove invaluable.

Business Dull On Pine Street.

The tone of the market on Pine street is steady, notwithstanding that the disposition of operators is bearish in the extreme. The holidays may have something to do with the dullness in trade. At any rate it is a valid excuse, and, it can only be hoped, a correct one. Ore is being extracted from the Chollar-Brunswick without much being said about the matter, the management evidently appreciating the fact that deeds, not words, must speak in the future. The proposition to start in at American Flat is again afoot. It is a pity that some of the big men in the business cannot be induced to take the initiative in the unwatering of mines in this district, which have always been handicapped by lack of proper attention. Work in this direction would likely be much more profitable than grubbing about upper levels on the Comstock.

Los Angeles Fire Underwriters Combine.

If the insurance men of this city are unable to arrive at an arrangement whereby they can pool their issues at a profit to all, the fraternity down South proposes to do so in self-protection. Strange to say, they have come to San Francisco to find out how to do it, and have already succeeded pretty well in accomplishing the desired results.

Edwin Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

THE Examiner has fallen all over itself with righteous horror at what it pleases to declare is personal malignity, wanton cruelty, and inhuman persecution on the part of Mr. Vining, in causing the arrest of one Albert Chou, a newsboy, and has thrown itself into the breach with the rare heroism that invariably distinguishes that highly moral journal when it can get a little free advertising by posing as a friend of the down-trodden and afflicted. According to his portrait in the sheet in question, Albert is rather a tough specimen of his kind, instead of the innocent, abused young hero depicted by the facile pen of a space writer in mortal terror of losing his job. Doubtless the youthful Albert deserves punishment in some form, but is it not rather more than he deserves to be defended by the Examiner?

"ANXIOUS Correspondent" bombards this office with queries as to whether the Mrs. Lease who got mixed up the other day in a shooting scrape with her husband, on account of the attentions paid her by another man named Woods, is the silver-tongued Mary Yellin of Populistic and petticoated fame. No, it is not the same. To begin with, Papa Lease is too well trained to become mutinous, and domestic cares weigh too heavily upon him to keep tab on his wife. Besides, no man, unless he were drunk, would dream of making love to a rampant stump speaker like Mary. So far as she and her ilk are concerned, however, it would be a good idea for civic peace if they would all take to the Woods.

"WHAT is justice?" howled the speaker of the evening at the meeting of the Socialist Labor Party one night this week. Justice, my wild-eyed bomb-thrower, is the power that is supposed to reach out and gather in criminals and disturbers of the peace, and were its laws in active operation in this city, it would be short grass and dry pickings for you and others of your ilk. We all know what Justice is, but cannot always locate her in San Francisco.

A BURGLAR with long, hushy whiskers, choked a Fulton-street housekeeper into insensibility the other day, but we do not agree with the detectives now working on the case that the unknown thug was a well-known Police Court Judge on a Christmas spree. Innocent men have before this been the victims of purely circumstantial evidence. The TOWN CRIER has frequently warned the Judge that his reckless extravagance in whiskers would get him into trouble.

LOUISA Worthington, who has already had three trials, is now attempting the threadbare insanity dodge on a fourth one. The Susie Martin case has probably given the murderess fresh courage to renew her battle against justice. A few wholesome life imprisonments and hangings would have a highly beneficial effect upon the morals of this pistol-practicing community.

SEVERAL more newly-fledged attorneys have been admitted to practice by Supreme Court decree. When the number of lawyers in the city is taken into consideration, it is hardly surprising that they throng like vultures around an estate, and pounce with tiger-like clutches on the wills of the departed. The situation, after all, must be a desperate one. Even a lawyer has to live.

TWO policemen having been dismissed from the force for drinking while on duty, the question now arises as to what we shall do for them. The TOWN CRIER suggests that they be assigned to editorial positions on the Examiner. Their weakness will be their best qualification for the job.

OKLAND is going to raise potatoes a la Pingree. We wish her success. Her crop of fossils and cranks has been so prolific that there is no reason why the succulent and life-saving spud should not flourish there.

IT does not require the wisdom of a seer to prophesy that W. H. T. Durrant will die of a peaceful old age.

JAKE RUDOLPH, the miscreant who goes about peppering people with hot lead from a loaded gun carried conveniently for that purpose, and who claims that he does not know what he is doing when he is drunk, should be given several years behind the bars as an inducement to sobriety. Excuses should not serve you, Jake; the chestnut plea you always make is nothing but a time-worn fake.

IT is singular that in trying to clear up the mystery surrounding the suicide of a despondent cigar-maker this week, the detectives have laid no stress on the fact that the unfortunate man just previous to his demise had been seen smoking one of his own cigars. As up to that moment he was in the best of health and spirits, subsequent events are transparent as crystal to the TOWN CRIER'S mind.

NOW that the holidays are o'er,
The great Examiner will cease
Its generous (?) free-ad uproar
About the "gaunt wolf at the door;"
And leave, unnoticed, as before,
The poor, to starve to death in peace.

WALTER HYDE, of Alameda, has invented a machine that rolls him over hourly during the stilly watches of the night. If Mr. Hyde would only invent something, now, that would roll some of San Francisco's unesteemed citizens over in the night, and keep them rolling, to a point, say, about half way between the water front and Goat Island, he would be canonized as a public benefactor.

JUDGE Slack issued an order this week, compelling a recalcitrant husband to pay his wife six dollars per week for her support. Any man who has a wife capable of existing on six dollars weekly, and who does not appreciate the blessing, ought to be punished by taking unto himself one who will make six hundred fly, and then cry for more.

AFTER all, there is not so much of a novelty about that dancing cow at a local playhouse. The TOWN CRIER has seen some terpsichorean cavortings and gyrations at the private entertainments of some of our local "aristocracy" (Lord help us!) that would put that interesting and conscientious hovine quite to the blush.

PERHAPS the easiest and best way to rid ourselves of Chinese cheap labor is to encourage the continuance of bloodshed in Chinatown until the last pigtail is laid low. If they kill each other off, we shall be quite relieved of responsibility, and will be the better for their disappearance from our midst.

"WATCH night" was generally observed according to annual custom throughout the city on New Year's Eve, but the light-fingered gentry who relieve us under cover of darkness of our time-pieces keep "watch night" unobserved, according to nocturnal custom, the year round. Watch out for yours.

THE Pacific Coast Women's Press Association, at its last meeting, discussed newspapers in all their phases. Probably the subject was treated from the standpoint of the reader. It certainly could not have been from that of a newspaper writer.

BERKELEY'S arc lights have been snuffed out, but the intellectual lights that shed effulgence through the craniums of Berkeley's brain-laden faculty shine on and on with undimmed luster and no extra charges to tax payers.

WHATEVER else may be said to the disparagement of the Farallones as a place of residence or a site for a grammar school, it cannot be asserted that the locality is insufficiently ventilated.

CONSIDERING the fact that $10,500 is but a drop in the bucket of money needed to put the County Hospital into proper sanitary condition, would it not be better to abandon the structure at once to the rats and bats.

WITH its street illuminations nightly overhead, and its cobbles always under foot, San Francisco may now justly claim the distinction of being the best-lighted and worst-paved city in these United States.

BENEATH this stone lies Asa Fisk.
He died 'cos business was not brisk.

IT is indeed a dull day in San Francisco when a will is not disputed.

SOCIETY does not seem to have "enthused" to any great extent over the holidays this year, as the entertainments have been neither numerous, nor large in size. To be sure, there have been theatre parties and small dinners, but with the exception of the Club dances, terpsichore has not made the showing usually looked for and expected during the holiday season proper.

The Christmas Eve dance of the Fortnightly Club was one of the pleasantest of the winter so far. The hall had a very pretty Christmas dressing of evergreens, holly and red berries, intermingled with mistletoe, and the attendance of beaux and belles was unusually large, all entering into the spirit of the affair with zest. To Miss Genevive Goad fell the honor of leading the cotillion, which she did with the assistance of a trio of young beaux of the club, and acquitted herself charmingly, some of the figures danced being both original and pretty.

The cotillion given by Miss Jennie Moore on Christmas night was a brilliant gathering. The whole upper floor of the San Francisco Verein Club was given up to the use of the young hostess and her guests, the decorations of the ballroom being in ferns, palms and light berries. The gowns worn by the young ladies were remarkably handsome, the young hostess, who led the cotillion with Jesse Triest, wearing a lovely costume of pale green satin combined with lavender. There were five figures danced, and the favors consisted of fans, bric-a-brac, jewelry, etc. An elaborate supper served at midnight, after which there was general dancing until the early morning hours.

On Saturday night Howard Adams and Miss Gertrude Bates led the cotillion of the Saturday Evening Club at Lunt's Hall. The figures were all new, as was the music to which they were danced, and the entire affair was a very pronounced success.

Miss Jean Hush was the leader of the Leap Year cotillion of the Oakland Friday Night Club, which took place at Ebel Hall on New Year's Eve, the last Leap Year dance that will be given for eight years!

The dinners of Mrs. Joseph Ehrman, Dr. Herzstein and Mrs. M. Schweitzer, the latter at the Cliff House yesterday, were in honor of Miss Helen Schweitzer and her fiancée, Samuel Steifel; Miss Olga Triest's entertainment was in the form of a dance. The dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. I. N. Walter was in celebration of the twentieth anniversary of their wedding, at which were seated upwards of thirty of their intimate friends. Mrs. S. M. Van Wyck's recent tea was in compliment to Miss Jones.

The wedding ceremony of Miss Rose Fehheimer and Alfred Lilienfeld was performed by Rabbi Voorsanger at the home of the bride, on Broadway, last Tuesday afternoon. Miss Anna Liebenthal and Miss Edith Greenbaum were the bride's attendants, and the guests were limited to the relatives of the contracting parties, owing to the recent sad affliction in the bride's family.

On Thursday Grace Church was the scene of the marriage of Miss Bessie Younger and Burns McDonald, the Rev. Dr. Foute tying the nuptial knot at the hour of noon, amid lovely floral surroundings, in which pink was the dominating tint, and in the presence of a very large number of the friends of the young couple. Miss Maud Younger officiated as her sister's maid-of-honor, the Misses Lucille Younger, Francis Curry, Julia Crocker, Mae Tucker, and Kate Clarke forming a bevy of pretty bridesmaids. Duke Baxter supported the groom as best man, and Messrs. Herbert Younger, Ed. Greenway, George Cameron, Frank Owen, Sam Buckbee, and Dr. P. L. Brown appeared as ushers. Following the church service a wedding breakfast for the bridal party was served at the Palace Hotel, and the honeymoon will be spent in the southern part of the State.

The marriage of Miss Helen Schweitzer and Samuel Steifel will be solemnized next Tuesday at noon at the Schweitzer residence, on Leavenworth street. The fair bride has selected the Misses Belle Gerstle, Cora Miller, Alice Greenebaum, and Agnes Brandenstein for her attendants that day, and Miss Clara Joseph will officiate as maid-of-honor.

A number of engagements have been announced since the last issue of the NEWS LETTER, prominent among them being those of Miss Julia Crocker and Samuel Buckbee; Miss Alice Ames and Arthur Allen; Miss Anna Hobbs and Lieutenant Frank Ferris, U. S. A.; Miss Mattie Ehrman and Albert Frank; Miss Mattie Shainwald and Leo Mayers, Miss Mollie Hutchinson and Ernest Piezotto, and Mr. and Mrs. A. J. Ralston's friends are congratulating them upon the engagement of their son, Louis Ralston, to Miss Louise Summer, of Utica, New York. It was at a dinner given by Mrs. E. J. McCutcheon last week that the announcement was made of the Ames-Allen engagement, the understanding between the young people, while existing for more than a year past, only now being made public, and the wedding will, 'tis said, be an event of the april's Lenten season.

The Concordia and the San Francisco Verein Clubs both gave dances on New Year's eve. Mrs. Rounseville Wildman's tea was the chief society event of New Year's Day, and it is with regret that her friends hear of her intended departure for Mexico. Mrs. Wildman is so indefatigable a hostess she will be indeed a loss to the social world, so it is hoped her absence will not be a very prolonged one.

The New Year's amusements at Burlingame this year combined a pigeon shoot in the morning, a steeple chase in the afternoon, and then another drag hunt, with finally a dance at the Club House in the evening.

Among the pleasures that society has in prospect are the dance of the Monday Night Club at Golden Gate Hall, next Monday evening; the cotillion of the Friday Night Club, at Odd Fellows' Hall; the game of football, which will be played at Central Park next Saturday between the Army and Navy teams, and the team from the University Club, which promises to be a decidedly society affair; and the Army cotillion of the Friday Fortnightly Club, which will be danced on the evening of the 15th of January, at Lunt's Hall, Lieutenants Kilburn and Nolan dividing the honors as "leaders."

January is to be a month of "at homes," many of our hostesses sending out cards for certain afternoons during the month, as, for instance, Mrs. Beede, who is residing with Mrs. Rounseville Wildeman, has named Tuesdays during January; Mrs. Smedburg, Wednesdays; Mrs. Gordon Blanding, Mrs. Will Barnes, and Mrs. Webster Jones, Fridays during the month.

Mrs. Frank S. Johnson, who has been at Coronado Beach for the last six weeks with her children, has been joined by Mr. Johnson, who is now spending the holidays at this resort. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson will open up their summer home in San Rafael early in March.

Miss Daisy Doud will shortly leave for the Farallones, where she will instruct ten little children whose homes are on that lonely island. Miss Doud has many friends in this city, all of whom will wish her success when she starts upon her mission.

The ladies of Sorosis have issued instructions for next Monday afternoon to meet and listen to Mr. Frank Lincoln, the renowned entertainer. Mrs. H. E. Huntington will provide the programme.

The best way to buy anything is to borrow it first.

Dr Younger, who came from Chicago to attend his daughter Bessie's wedding, will leave again on his return on Sunday afternoon, and it will be some time ere San Francisco sees him again. Mrs. Younger will remain here a few weeks longer ere she joins her husband in the Windy City, and later the entire family will sail for Europe, where the marriage of Miss Alice Younger and Baron Nugent will take place at Vienna, in June. Mr. and Mrs. Jim Robinson anticipate a trip to Europe, leaving here early in February; Douglas Dick is now in Scotland, whither he has gone on a brief business trip.

A farewell pink luncheon was given to Mrs. John J. Husband by her sister, Mrs. Dr. Byron, Haines at the beautiful Haines residence in Belvedere on Wednesday last. Mr. and Mrs. Husband leave this week for London in which city they will make their home. At the dinner fourteen covers were set, among those present being, Miss Cosgrove, Miss Patricia Cosgrove, Miss Charlotte Cunningham, Miss May Reis, Miss Lillie Reis, Miss Kathryn Dillon, Miss Vesta Jordan, Mrs. H. L. Read, Mrs. James Russell, and Mrs. Frank Dickson.

The beautiful and imposing ceremonies at the late Kate Field's funeral will long be remembered by all those who witnessed them. To Mrs. Highton is due the credit for the artistic and perfect manner in which the ceremonies were conducted. She instigated the good work and saw that it was carried through to a successful conclusion. Not only this State, for whom she acted, but the journalists of the world are indebted to her. She has proved herself to be a loyal friend, indeed, to the departed.

Miss Maud Ingles Francis, who has been studying in Paris and Dresden for the last five years, returned to this Coast to assist as bridesmaid at the wedding of Miss Cora Goodrich of Los Angeles. Miss Francis is a sister-in-law to J. Schroeder by marriage and is now a guest of her brother-in-law and his wife at the California Hotel. In three or four weeks Miss Francis expects to return to her home in Peoria, Ill.

Clarence Eddy, the famous organist who lately visited this city, was entertained at a dinner party on Saturday evening last given by Mr. and Mrs. Wm. H. Mills at their residence, 2800 Jackson street. After the dinner Mr. Eddy attended the High and Low Jinks given at the Bohemian Club and left for the East on the following morning.

Mrs. Julia Melville Snyder, the well known teacher of vocal music, has moved her studio to 2517 1/2 California street between Steiner and Pierce streets. Few of our teachers are so universally liked as is Mrs. Snyder. Her method of teaching dramatic elocution is most thorough and many of her pupils now occupy prominent positions on the stage.

The members of Ignatian Council No. 35 Young Men's Institute are perfecting arrangements for their annual party to be held on Friday evening, January 22nd, at N. S. G. W. Hall. This event promises to eclipse all former affairs given under this Council's auspices.

Mrs. J. W. Coleman and Miss Jessie, Miss Florence Ives, Mrs. James Phelan, Mrs. Frank Sullivan, and Miss Ada are all at home again after long absences in the East and elsewhere.

Captain and Mrs. W. A. Nevills have been spending the holiday season in town, and are domiciled at their apartments in the Palace Hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. D. F. Verdenal have been visiting their daughter, the wife of Colonel Forsyth of Fresno, during the holidays.

The second of the Ehrman-Frank engagement receptions will be held at the Hotel Richelieu to-morrow.

The Union League Club will give a ladies' reception on Friday evening next, the 8th of January.

"He called me dear." "That doesn't prove anything. Gas is dear."—Washington Capital.

Max Abraham, the Caterer, 428 Geary street, has had his hands full during the holiday season. Mr. Abraham attends to banquets, dinners or luncheons and by retaining him you can be assured of satisfaction in every detail. He is patronized by all society and is recognized as the Prince of Caterers.

TWO A. M. IN A BROWNSTONE.

By FELIX MONTAGUE.

TWO o'clock!

The deep toll of the city clock startles the black silence that bangs over the city like a pall. The muffled cathedral chime, as it reverberates through the ballway, sounds like the hollow sepulchral voice of death. Black shadows flit nervously over the mosaic floor. The dim light flares up for a moment; then gloom and quiet. Silence as profound as death.

A heavy silken portière quivers, moves. Two dark glistening eyes peer up and down the hall. Softly the dark object steals from behind the portière, and, with tread as still as murder itself, passes under the dim light at the foot of the stairs. There, pausing, listening, it breathlessly peers up the gloomy stairway.

The intruder mounts the first step, listens. Takes the second, listens again, then the third and fourth, and, growing bolder, climbs stealthily to the top of the flight. Not a sound. Peering through the darkness, the noiseless visitor glides cautiously to a door, a door at the end of the corridor. The door is ajar, and the deep regular breathing of the sleeper may be heard. The dark object is now in the moon-lit room. All is quiet save the regular breathing. Then comes a grating sound from the room. The breathing ceases. The bed springs squeak. The grating sound is quiet. The silence is intense.

Suddenly a sharp report, a shattering of glass, a curse. A white-robed figure rushes madly across the corridor after the dark object. A missile is hurled at the intruder racing down the stairs. It misses, and thumps and bumps against the banisters. Doors in the upper corridor fly open. Voices cry: "What's the matter?" The white-robed figure answers: "Oh! a rat, and I've broken a mirror. D—n!"

OUR NEW YEAR'S GIFTS.

NEW Year's gifts, New Year's gifts,
Please come, all attend,
The NEWS LETTER proffers its New Year's gifts
To every faithful friend.

For Wally Hobart a little dog,
And a little huntsman, too,
With a little voice and a little horn
To wind a view—halloo.

For Mayor Phelan a little whip
With a lash with a little sting,
To lay it on when occasion calls,
And scourge the cunning ring.

To Frank McCoppin, whom all men like
Because he's honest and square,
Some better luck with a boh-tailed flush,
And success when he draws to a pair.

To Charlie Josselyn so debonair,
Who dresses in excellent taste,
A chance to the club with joy declare,
"By the Lord, I have found my waist."

To Billy Barton, the exile, back
From the frozen and stormy East,
Some sort of fabric to hide from men
The sight of his Bowery vest.

To Donald Graham, whose neckwear doth
With the rainbow's tinting vie,
A something to dazzle in color and glare
The latest London tie.

To Porter Ashe a little book,
Which circulates on the sly,
And the title upon this little work
Is simply: "The Art to Guy."

To Lansing Mizner, fat, honest boy,
Who knows not deceit or guile,
A gift to make life more complete,
A well-worn property smile.

To Mayor Sutro a picture wild
As a maniac's wildest dream,
Of purposes smashed and intentions foiled,
And its title: "What Might Have Been."

To Harry Dimond a carpet fine,
A rare Oriental mat,
To replace in cunning and high design
The one that was spoiled in "The Flat."

To Charley Baldwin the needed knack
Of how to handle the reins,
To Follanshee a better hat
Than the one he wears on the plains.

To Jere Lynch a little book,
Familiar to little folk,
And of use to all; whose title is,
"Good French as She is Spoke."

To Sammy Rainey a brief request:
"Since you own us, Sammy dear,
Go light, go light, the times are tight,
Don't squeeze us too hard this year."

To Jimmy Hamilton, actors' friend,
Of Napoleonic mold,
The Thespian ribbon, the Lodi cross,
And the fleur-de-lis in gold.

To Peter Donahue, rosy and young,
Whose complexion never pales,
A nice medalion, on ivory done,
Of his friend the Prince of Wales.

To James M. Thompson, the hold cashier,
Mill Valley's cowboy king,
A pistol whose ring is true and clear,
And a Bowie that hath a sting.

And more than we enumerate,
Gifts to the kind and true;
With warm hands and hearts elate,
Our friends we give to you;

We give, and wish you all God-speed
Throughout the coming year,
To cull the rose and shun the weed
While will mirth o'er masters care.

The clouds are speeding from the sky,
And, rising calm and clear,
We see and hail prosperity
To mark the glad New Year.

THE OLD FLAG — H. C. BUNNER, IN SCRIBNER'S.

OFF with your hat as the flag goes by
 And let the heart have its say;
 You're man enough for a tear in your eye
 That you will not wipe away;
 You're man enough for a thrill that goes
 To your very finger-tips—
 Ay! the hump just then in your throat that rose Spoke more than your parted lips.
 Lift up the boy on your shoulder, high,
 And show him the faded shred—
 Those stripes would be red as the sunset sky
 If death could have dyed them red.
 The man that bore it with Death has lain
 These twenty years and more;—
 He died that the work should not be vain
 Of the men who bore it before.
 The man that bears it is bent and old,
 And ragged his beard and gray,—
 But look at his eye fire young and bold,
 At the tune that he hears them play.
 The old tune thunders through all the air,
 And strikes right in to the heart;—
 If ever it calls for you, boy, be there!
 Be there, and ready to start.
 Off with your hat as the flag goes by!
 Uncover the youngster's head!
 Teach him to hold it holy and high,
 For the sake of its sacred dead.

MY LITTLE GIRL.—SAMUEL MINTURN PECK, IN TIMES-DEMOCRAT.

My little girl is nestled
 Within her tiny bed,
 With amber ringlets crested Around her dainty head;
 She lies so calm and stilly,
 She breathes so soft and low,
 She calls to mind a lily
 Half hidden in the snow.
 A weary little mortal
 Has gone to slumberland;
 The Pixies at the portal
 Have caught her by the hand:
 She dreams her broken dolly
 Will soon be mended there,
 That looks so melancholy
 Upon the rocking-chair.
 I kiss your wayward tresses,
 My drowsy little queen;
 I know you have caresses
 From floating forms unseen;
 O angels, let me keep her
 To kiss away my cares,
 This darling little sleeper
 Who has my love and prayers.

WHEN GRAN'MA WAS THERE.—ATLANTA CONSTITUTION.

The old house seemed to brighten with a pesceful, lovin' light
 A-drivin' out the shadders t' the bosom o' the night;
 The look o' calm contentment on her face, so soft 'n fair,
 Made ever'thing 'pear better—when gran'ma was there;
 The beams ud come a-creepin' through the mornin' glory vine,
 'N' golden rays o' sunshine about her head 'ud twine,
 Tell they made a perfec' halo with the silver in her hair,
 A-dancin' 'n' a-bethin'—when gran'ma was there.
 Ever'thing got quiet, with a kind o' pure delight,
 'N' put us all to smilin' when her face come in sight;
 There 'ud be a lovin' quiver in the little rockin' chair,
 Jes' like it was happy, too—when gran'ma was there.
 'N' now the little churchyard holds a saddened charm for me,
 I never go a-near it but I pause beneath a tree,
 Whose boughs 're allus sighin', with the faintest breath o' air,
 A-sorrowin' 'n' a-sayin' that—gran'ma is there.

In response to many inquiries from all parts of the country about the Railway and Dock Construction Company

The officials hereby give full information in regard to the company, its business and prospects.

The company offers 20,000 shares of stock for sale in lots to suit purchasers at $20 per share. The par value is $100 per share—full paid and unassessable—stockholders have no individual liability whatever. The company has no indebtedness of any kind—is in solid financial condition—and, as there are no bonds nor mortgages, all the earnings go to the stockholders.

The adoption of this Company's system of construction by the United States Government, or any Foreign Government, or by any one of the large cities in America or Europe will cause the stock to rise above par ($100) immediately.

The most conservative investors, old shrewd bear operators on the stock exchange, have bought this stock and confidently predict it is sure to pay large dividends and sell at over $200 a share as the Railway and Dock Construction Co. commence business under much more favorable conditions than did the Bell Telephone Co., whose stock rose from about $10 to over 200; or the original Edison Electric Co., whose stock rose from 45 to $3000 a share, or the many other companies owning useful inventions whose stocks rose rapidly in value while paying large dividends to the alert original investors.

Many prominent men in banking, railway and financial circles and other expert judges of stock values predict that this stock will pay large dividends and will sell at over $200 per share for the following reasons:

The Railway and Dock Construction Company controls all the rights, titles, patents and interests in and the sole, absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell the new indestructible piles that do away altogether with the millions of wooden piles heretofore used everywhere, which only last a short time, as alternate moisture and drying and the marine worms soon destroy the wood, and leave a deceptive shell, incapable to sustain a load that requires the full strength of the original pile. Old wooden piles must be continually replaced at great expense.

Nothing can compete with the indestructible Pile in the construction of piers, docks, bulkheads, sea-walls, foundations for bridges, lighthouses, jetties, breakwaters or other improvements in rivers, harbors or on the sea coast.

This pile is an absolute necessity in railway trestlework, as it guarantees safety, and it will last forever, and there is an enormous demand for it.

One defective wooden pile derailing a train causes a loss of many thousands of dollars in lives and property destroyed.

Applications are pouring in from engineers, contractors and railway officials all over the United States. These men are quick to see the certainty of profit. They are perhaps better able to judge than others, because, out of a total of 1891 railroads, 373 of these railway companies are now preparing to build 20,547 miles of new line. The great superiority of the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system of solid, substantial, indestructible trestle work is causing the demand in this special field.

Estimated earnings from this one source of profit will pay $7 per share annual dividends—this is equal to 35 per cent. cash dividends per year on stock bought now at present price of $20 per share.

Other and larger sources of profit will come from contracts now in view, viz:—

In place of the old wooden docks, covered by temporary sheds, which now disfigure the water fronts of our cities, this company will build solid, indestructible piers, on which permanent iron, stone or brick buildings are put up just the same as on land.

Private owners of dock property as well as dock officials in the numerous cities are becoming aware of the great advantage of using the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system of building indestructible piers to make a solid foundation, upon which large buildings can be erected, from which they can get big revenues for rentals, etc.

$27,000,000 have already been expended in improving Southern harbors and their approaches.

In projects now under way over fifty million dollars will be spent in improving navigation in rivers, bays, etc., throughout the country on jetties, breakwaters, and other work in which the indestructible Pile is a great necessity.

The city of New York is spending $5,000,000 a year improving the city water front.

In a private conversation Hon. J. Sergeant Cram, ex-President of the Board of Dock Commissioners said: "There is an immense fortune in this company's system of construction."

The U. S. Senate Committee have recommended the expenditure of eighty million dollars for the protection of our seacoast. About ten millions a year will be spent during the next eight years.

The United States Government spent about $10,000,000 in deepening the entrance of the Mississippi to divert tidal action by old style work, which will be supplanted in future by the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system. $6,000,000 has already been expended on the two immense jetties in the bay at Galveston: they are simply loose rock dumped into the water. Each jetty is about 4½ miles long and forms a continuous pyramid 100 feet wide at the bottom, tapering to 15 feet wide at the top above the water. The Railway and Dock Construction Company build indestructible jetties of the same size at the bottom as the top and save this enormous waste of stone and labor.

The "St. Louis Critic" strongly advocates the adoption of this company's system of indestructible jetties to deepen the Mississippi at St. Louis.

To provide additional funds to execute some of this work, the company offers 20,000 shares to the public in lots to suit at the low price of $20.00 per share in order to have the stock quickly taken. There are no salaried officials. The money derived from the sale of stock, when not used in profitable construction work, remains in the company's treasury.

Many leading marine engineers and experts say: "This company's system of construction is coming into universal use in building all improvements in rivers and harbors."

As the business in sight is too large for this company to handle alone, the subsidiary companies now being organized in the principal States each pay a certain amount in cash and one-third of their capital stock into the Railway and Dock Construction Co.'s treasury. In addition to large sums in cash the company will receive about $20,000,000 in securities in this way, on which dividends will be paid from the earnings of the subsidiary companies. These dividends all go to the holders of Railway and Dock Construction stock.

With a large surplus and an ample cash working capital the company will hold assets of $200 per share for each share now offered at $20 when all details are completed.

Application will be made to list the shares on the stock exchange.

Owing to the financial depression and uncertainty before the election the Railway and Dock Construction Company would not accept numerous contracts for work amounting to about three millions of dollars. They were offered first mortgage bonds in payment but the bonds could not be sold at that time in New York or London at satisfactory prices. English bankers are now negotiating to place a large block of Railway and Dock Construction stock and apply for an official quotation on the London Stock Exchange.

The officials and large stockholders are well-known practical financiers and business men, whose names are at once a synonym for trustworthy, capable management and a guarantee that any stock in which they invest is safe, solid and profitable. Among them are

HOW WE MISSED OUR CHRISTMAS DINNER.

By John P. Albro.

PROBABLY no portion of the wide-spreading Rocky Mountains excels the Bitter Root Range, which stretches along the Northern boundary of Idaho nearly to the Yellowstone Park, in inaccessibility and the wild grandeur of its scenery. Snows, almost eternal, cap its lofty summits and linger in its shady narrow gorges long after the surrounding country bathes in summer heat. It is a picturesque though difficult region for railroading but, notwithstanding the expense and labor, necessity has compelled more than one transcontinental line to brave its perilous passes. I had been mining, with my partner Howard Mindou, all the summer of 189— on the western slope of one of these passes. We had been moderately successful. Christmas was approaching and the cold and snow had begun to interfere with the season's work. Not only that, but a natural longing to spend the holidays at home with friends induced us to shut down our little mill and seek a more congenial climate. We were delayed in starting and as the passenger train ran only once a day and was reported indefinitely late on account of storms, we decided to take the freight train which passed our little station eastward bound in the evening. Packing up our little store of accumulated wealth, we hoarded the caboose of a lumber train. The train was made up, besides the caboose, of twelve cars heavily loaded with lumber from Puget Sound, drawn by a huge Mogul engine much in vogue on those difficult grades. We were soon in the mountains happy to have a respite from our rough toil and in the anticipation of Christmas joy which we knew awaited us. The train toiled painfully up to the crest of the grade. Better time might be expected and in that we were not disappointed. We had barely traveled a mile when the speed attained attracted our attention as well as that of the conductor and rear brakeman, our only company. Soon the flying rocks and trees, and the swaying of the car showed that the sober limit of freight train travel was being far exceeded. The conductor showed uneasiness and got up, staggered his way to the door and opened it just as through the crisp air came a wild screech from the engine for brakes. The engine could not hold the train. We were all aroused to the situation in an instant. The conductor sprang to the front brake and twisted the wheel in desperation. Howard and I together reached the rear platform and put our combined strength to the task of setting the brake there, while the brakeman climbed the lumber cars in front, jumping from one to the other as fast as he could turn the brakes. We were now going at an incredible speed. The wind of our movement rushed through the open doors so fiercely as to nearly sweep us from our feet. The cars in the long train were weaving from side to side as they struck the sharp curves and the light caboose at the end rocked with a violence that threatened to throw it from the tracks at any moment. The train was so far beyond control that the brakes had no apparent effect, for the wheels slid along the glistening rails as though they were ice and our train a brand new hob sled. The conductor had gone forward to help the brakemen, and Mindou and I, our usefulness at an end, climbed into the little lookout on the roof to watch what was going on ahead. The sight was not one to encourage dreams of Christmas pleasures. The great mass of the runaway train was thundering down one of the most perilous inclines known in the Rockies. The descent itself was but a part of the danger. One must imagine the abrupt curves round which the flying monster rushed with half the wheels apparently in the air, the jagged rocks which lined the route ready to make kindling wood of any car that left the track, and the yawning ravines, a hundred feet in depth or more, open mouthed to receive us, in order to appreciate our situation. We had run five miles from the summit and knew that Devil's Gulch was just ahead. Could we pass it in safety? Around the projecting point ahead it lay, and we gripped each other's hands and set our teeth to await the awful issue. Our eyes were riveted upon the engine. It shot a round the curve and struck the straight track over the gulch. Rolling like a ship in a storm it still held to the safe path. Car after car followed suit, until the middle of the train was reached. On the sixth car the rear brakeman was straining at the wheel. The pace was too much. The car and the one behind it shot out from the curve and plunged down the terrible abyss. We closed our eyes expecting to go the same road in our turn. We heard the despairing yell of the brakeman and the dull thud of shivered cars against the rocks below which told of his awful fate. The coupling had broken and we were still on the track. The gulch was passed but equal dangers lay ahead, magnified by the fact that our train was now in two wildly careening sections. We saw the fireman wave his hands in warning to us to save ourselves, and saw him jump into a mass of snow and rocks, against the mountain side. The head brakeman quickly followed his example. We saw them lie stunned and helpless as we thundered past, and learned afterward that they escaped alive but both sadly crippled. Car after car from our decimated train fell by the wayside until only two remained ahead of the caboose on our section, and only one was still with the engine. The conductor had scrambled back to the caboose. We held a hurried consultation and decided to stick to the car. Fifteen awful minutes passed in similar suspense; minutes, anyone of which might be our last. At the end of that time we had reached the plain and the long level track ahead aroused a hope of safety. The speed was slackening noticeably, but a rod on the engine had broken loose and was piercing the boiler at every turn of the drivers. It was suddenly jolted from the track a few hundred yards ahead of us and lay with its nose in a ditch in a cloud of escaping steam, and we were at last brought to a halt by crashing into it. Beyond a few bruises we found ourselves unhurt, but the engineer, brave and faithful to the last like so many of his calling, was found scalded to death by the escaping steam. Mindou and I ate our Christmas turkey on New Year's day that year, with many a sigh for our less fortunate companions, thankful for our lives, determined that henceforward passenger trains would be good enough accommodation for us.

No finer stock of Jewelry and Silverware was ever exhibited in this city than A. Hirschman, No. 10 Post street, (Masonic Temple) has on exhibition, and his prices are most reasonable.

EVERYONE in our city seems to have had a joyous Christmas; even the poor were more generously remembered than ever before, and society—well, society always has a good time. The girls had heaps of pretty presents and the men enough ties and handkerchiefs to last indefinitely. There are whispers of several new engagements to be announced at the opening of the New Year. One of two sisters and two brothers will not very much astonish society, as things have been pointing that way for some time past.

How many of us will start in the New Year with innumerable good desires, good resolves, and good intentions, and alas! how many will have hilt their hopes on sand and their string of good intentions turn to be a mere thread broken by the first pull at it! A few pretty huds have confided their set purpose to us, and they are so earnest, too. Miss Helen Wagner is going to be as good as good can be, going to church every Sunday, and joining some charitable society to help the deserving poor. Miss Clemmie Kip is going to give up theatre parties; Miss Mary Kip to abjure making conquests; Miss Caro Crockett is going to give half her pocket money to the poor; Miss Helen Hopkins will do without one pair of gloves a month from her allowance, and devote the same to some worthy charity; Miss Kate Salisbury will knit a pair of wristlets for some deserving old man; Miss May Belle Gwin will stop breaking hearts; Miss Ethel Cohen will not be so general in her fascinations, but settle on one; Miss Gertie Foreman will study the map of South Africa; Miss Cora Smedburg will not pout once during the year; Miss Marie Zane will find a key to her affections. These are a few; more later on, when the girls announce themselves.

* * *

The news that Dr. Harry Tevis meditates making Bakersfield his future home has created quite a ripple of disturbance among his fair friends in the city, for who is a more popular member of society than the handsome young doctor? However, the profession which he has chosen is overstocked in the city, and they say he is ambitious of doing good work in it, so will devote his professional labors to the rural districts and enjoy the social side of life at his brother Will's. Mrs. Will Tevis is very fond of large house parties, and our prettiest belles never refuse an invitation to make one of the bidden thereto.

* * *

Gay doings are still the order of the day at the snug Hotel Rafael. The climate of San Rafael is anything but wintry, and many of our leading society folk appear to appreciate the fact as they are still to be found there. Manager Warfield makes the comfort of each guest his own business, and that all are well looked after goes without saying. New Year's Day was celebrated in good old-fashioned manner by the guests there assembled.

* * *

The B'lingham "hunt" was not the success hoped for by the habitués of that swagger settlement. Possibly, the holiday ties of town, the unsettled state of the weather, and the newness of the thing may, in a measure, account for this, and people say that the next affair of the kind will be a howling success. Qui vivra verra.

* * *

It is considered a coincidence by the society girls that two of their number—Miss Julia Crocker and Miss Alice Ames—should have signalized their return from European travel by a resolve to settle down in the quiet path of domestic life.

Little Lady Hesketh—Flo' Sharon—seems to have settled down into English country life, her absorbing pastime being hunting. Californian friends who have been in her vicinity say her old home and its associations have quite lost all charm for her.

CHRISTMAS almost upon us and the ground white enough with snow to satisfy even the most gloomy dreaders of a green Christmas. It is very beautiful and most inconvenient. One can scarcely get about and for all excepting the favored few who dwell in the midst of things, the shops display in vain their tempting wares. There is nothing very new in Christmas decoration this year, nor in holiday gifts; but where so much is beautiful there is no necessity for anything new. But year by year the drain upon one's pocket-book becomes more and more severe for the veriest trifles are of an extravagance in price appalling to think of. In accordance with the sentiment that Christmas means a competitive race in lavish if not reckless expenditure, the fashion of flower-giving is at its height, and as nothing soars higher in price than orchids and violets, these are par excellence the choice. They may not be sent, as of old, in a simple card board box, but must be enclosed in a gorgeously painted case, fastened with yards of broad ribbon, or else sent in crystal or porcelain vases, whose appearance will at once indicate their foreign manufacture. Thus are all save the rich excluded from the pretty custom of flower sending. Tu bon-bous it is the same; but he whose purse will allow him to echo his heart's sentiment with the jingle of coin may express his Christmas hopes in "sweets to the sweet."

The bicycle shines forth more radiantly than ever, and there are special departments in all the stores for the sale of everything that can in any sense be associated with the royal master of the road. A sensation has been caused by the engagement in a big shop of Choynski, the Californian pugilist, as the manager of the "athletic goods department," and one paper humorously suggests the possibility of his giving lessons in knock-down blows to all exasperating or tiresome purchasers. The suggestion is picturesque.

We have had a true social sensation this week in the raid made by Captain Chapman, of the "Tenderloin Precinct," upon Sherry's, the exclusive and fashionable restaurant in Fifth Avenue, where many not of the Four Hundred, but of the still more conservative One Hundred and Fifty, are wont to gather. The occasion was a dinner given by Herbert Seeley, grandson of the late P. T. Barnum, to his brother, who is soon to marry. As is very often the case nowadays, the dinner guests were diverted by a vaudeville show—skirt dancing, banjo-playing and that sort of thing during the evening. An agent from whom the talent was not engaged announced to the Police Captain during the afternoon that an indecent entertainment was arranged, and that his own daughter had indignantly and with tears told him that she had been asked to dance in the altogether. This is the Captain's explanation why he burst in upon a peaceful dinner party when absolutely nothing improper was taking place, and where his arrival was naturally resented. Result—a cataclysm in society and threats of all sorts of revenge from the Gallic Sherry.

An amusing afterpiece to this tempest has been played in New Rochelle, where the members of the New Rochelle Yacht Club gave a smoker, with vaudeville, a few nights ago. Lena Routt, one of the dancers at Mr. Seeley's dinner, was a dancer at the smoker, and since the raid all the wives and sweethearts of the New Rochelle yachtsmen have made life agreeable for their present and future lords, and I am told that one man has gone so far as to make out an affidavit before a notary that the smoker was respectable. This, it is stated, he intends as a Christmas gift for his wife. And, by the way, I heard only this morning of an odd Christmas gift which the wife and daughter of a wealthy Harlem merchant are making to the head of their family. It is a pledge not to drink for one year, signed by the mother, and a similar pledge for six months, signed by the daughter; neither of the women is addicted to drink, but both admit that they find abstinence difficult.

Society is in its very whirl at present. There was a pretty wedding yesterday, when Miss Duncan, a grand-niece of John C. Calhoun and a niece of Mr. Thomas Addis Emmet was married at Dr. Emmet's residence. The most Reverend Archbishop of New York performed the ceremony, and a wedding breakfast, limited to relatives, followed. Miss Eugenie Ferrer, an intimate friend of the family, played the wedding music.

Amadee de Guerville, well-known amongst you for his work as Japanese war correspondent and later as lecturer, was married to-day to Miss Laura Spraker, who has youth, beauty, and wealth. De Guerville has made hosts of friends for himself amongst the best people in New York.

Mrs. Oelrichs and Miss Fair were the only two Californians who graced the Patriarchs' Ball. Mrs. Oelrichs I saw at the opera not long ago, very beautiful in pale blue satin, and more animated than I have ever seen her.

Henry Scott and family are at the Holland House. "Jack" Wentworth, of Sacramento, at the Albemarle. Miss Ida Scooffy has just returned to New York, and will leave for California almost immediately after Christmas.

"Joe" Redding leaves to-morrow to spend the Christmas holidays with friends in New Hampshire, but will return before the New Year.

DEAR EDITH: It is evident that the latest method of fashion in Paris is to have the bodice and skirt both of one material, relieved, of course, with any amount of color in the very ornate and elaborate decoration. This style, however, does not seem to interfere with the reign of the still popular separate waist.

We are gradually growing accustomed to the present styles, and learning to live up to them. Parting from our full sleeves was a terrible wrench; but the sacrifice is accomplished, and we have found means of obtaining the same effects. Bows of ribbon placed rather low on the shoulder, frills and ruffles that stand out like a coxcomb, give that style of width across the shoulders which is invariably becoming. In Paris, coat-sleeves are made quite plain, and the ruffled sleeve is either surmounted by a wide bow and elegant drapery or two or three frills. The Louis Seize sleeve is plain at the top, all the fullness coming in at the elbow. Sometimes a double set of frills forms two fans, one on each side of the arm. Endless top draperies are indulged in, and if the skirt is of a gossamer material, it is a pretty idea to have five or seven little frill flounces for the top of the sleeve. Many of these flouncings are edged or bound with satin or velvet bebe ribbon, black velvet being used to trim vivid pinks or ambers, whilst apple-green, or turquoise, or even poppy-red, would be trimmed with white satin bebe ribbon. Indeed, ribbons are still greatly in favor. A rather wide ribbon does duty in short loops for a basque, and decorates the fronts of bodices in a new Prince of Wales bow, forming three loops at the top (like the Prince's feathers), and two below. The real butterfly bow, when properly made, is a perfect finish for the back of waist and neck, but it requires skillful banding. The center must be rucked or gathered to imitate the butterfly's body, and the side loops carefully arranged like the lovely insect's wings. Ribbons, like everything else, must be judiciously used, for they can make or mar the dress. Inch-wide velvet ribbon may be turned to advantage in a hundred ways, and nothing can be prettier. Belts of it wind three times round the waist, securely fastened by fancy pins, and bretelles of the same are fastened by rosettes with a brilliant paste center over the shoulders. On the skirts, graduated widths are used in five or seven rows—they begin narrow, gradually widening as they reach the hem. Or they are made into a trellis-work, unless Vs or a Greek design is preferred.

Velvets are extensively used in combination with silk and wool; chameleon and illuminated shadings, raised and sunken designs, plaids and stripes are all seen—in fact, the patterns and color combinations are as varied as those of the silks.

Trimmings are greatly used, even skirts being ornamented with passementerie or embroidered bands. Wide passementeries are noticeable in jet and colors for trimming boleros and waists; narrow colored beaded gimps in garnet, brown, and green are in demand. Made-up satin and velvet revers in a combination of embroidery, lace, and beads, are a pretty addition to bodices or jackets.

MANZANITA.

GREAT peace be unto you this Christmas-tide,
 The ways are many and the world is wide;
 Rest thee a while this crucifix before,
 And let your heart of bears' keep open door!
 So shall the Christ-child enter unaware
 With lips of beneficence and shining hair.

Oh, mirth-abounding, good saint Santa Claus,
 Make thou our Christmas, let who will our laws!
 Lead thou each wanderer to some hearthstone wide,
 That none be lonely on this Christmas-tide,
 Or if one dreams of home in passes gray,
 Drop by his side this manzanita spray.

Ripe berries red, what tender thoughts ye bring
 Of holly, home and heaven's transcendent King,
 Who, toiling, trod Judean sands alone,
 That each might keep glad Christmas with his own;
 Peace, peace on earth, good will to warring men,
 Ring, happy bells, forever and again!

Good friends, sweet friends, this time of joyous cheer,
 Dispelling distance brings your faces near,
 And welds what scattered links of love below,
 Within the regnant yule log's ruddy glow;
 But ways are many and the world is wide—
 God's peace abide with you this Christmas-tide.

ANNIE HERBERT.

MR. Edouard Cucuel, whose charming articles and sketches descriptive of life in Paris have so often appeared in the NEWS LETTER, is at present visiting his parents in this city. Some years ago Mr. Cucuel studied in the San Francisco Art School, and then accepted a position on the Call, his illustrative work even in those days attracting much attention. He left San Francisco, however, and studied in Paris for four years, becoming one of the most popular and able of the little circle of American students there. His clever sketches appearing in several of the leading Parisian dailies brought him into considerable prominence, and he is now a valued member of the New York Herald's staff. After his vacation the young artist will return to that city, followed by the good wishes of hosts of friends on this Coast.

THE feet of the Four Hundred must needs be well shod. So indeed must the feet of anyone who makes pretense to gentility, and it is a matter of note that the style of my lady's shoe (and of man's too, for that matter) changes oftener than the fashion of her sleeve. The custom maker of fine footwear seems to be the only salvation for the ultra fashionable, and J. M. McNulty, of 139 Post Street, is the "Redfern of the Foot" for San Francisco Society. He came from Thomas' of London, and, to quote himself "makes shoes for the best people here and the best that come here." He makes his own lasts, imports all his stock, and needless to say, the quality of his work is above criticism.

ONE of the most charming calendars for this year is entitled the Joaquin Miller Calendar, published by the Whitaker and Ray Co. of this city. The calendar is delicately illustrated with Californian flowers and contains some good specimens of the verse of America's greatest living poet. It is just the thing to send to your friends as a memento of this State.

Are You Going East?

The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, Santa Fe Route, is the coolest and most comfortable summer line, owing to its elevation and absence of alkali dust. Particularly adapted to the transportation of families or large parties, owing to its Pullman palace drawing room and modern upholstered tourist sleepers, which run daily through from Oakland to Chicago via Kansas City. Ticket office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle building. Telephone Main 1531.

Have you been out to Leona Heights yet? If not you have missed one of the simple pleasures of life. Commodious electric cars run there from all parts of Oakland and Alameda and the round trip is only fifty cents. There is a good restaurant on the grounds, but no bar. This precludes the appearance of any roughs on the premises.

THE GENUINE "BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES" are sold only in boxes. They are wonderfully effective for Coughs and Throat Troubles.

NEW YEAR RUMORS.

I've heard that during Ninety-Seven
 This town will boycott all the papers
 That love a lie; and put, thereby,
 An end to journalistic capers;
 Will hang, with rope that will not break,
 The fiend that perpetrates a fake.
 I hear that ministers will preach
 Once more their sermons from the Bible,
 Nor for fat salaries beseech.
 (I really hope this isn't libel).
 The rumor, too, is growing rife
 That every man will love his wife.
 Nay, more, that Benedicts will scorn
 To quote that chestnut old, moss-carried,
 About the club where, night till morn,
 All innocently they have tarried,
 But stay in their domestic lives
 Each blessed evening of their lives.
 These are queer things, I will admit,
 To gain authenticated rumor,
 But I've not told you all of it.
 A signed death-warrant to the bloomer
 Will soon be filed away, I hear,
 Among the archives of the year.
 One more reform. When winter days
 Have melted into torrid summer
 We shall not have to dodge the gaze
 Of every idiot new-comer
 Who made the air around us blue
 With "Is it hot enough for you?"
 They're saying, too, that all our girls
 Until they've reached the sere and yellow
 With wrinkled brows and corkscrew curls,
 Will never love a richer fellow.
 I might believe the rest of it;
 But this last New Year rumor? Nit!

THE PHILOSOPHER.

LOOK to your laurels, Southern California! Fresno has thrown down the gauntlet as a producer of the golden lemon and orange, and has backed her claim to recognition by a successful Citrus Fair. The favored fruits of the "frostless belt" are now as an aureole around the head of the Raisin Queen. Long live Fresno! Long live the grape! The grape helped the Fair to succeed. Instance the magnificent Pagoda of the St. George vineyard, whose luscious wines brought home a medal from the Atlanta Exposition. The choice vintages from "Maltermoro" were beautifully displayed by Manager John H. Markham, of the Fresno Branch, and the report of its success is recounted with pride at the branch cellar, 123 Market street, in this city. It is a well-known fact that all the wines from the St. George vineyard are absolutely pure. Adulteration is an unheard of thing, and, figuratively speaking, it can be said that the wine goes direct from the grape to the bottle. This is one of the prime reasons why these wines are so popular among connoisseurs. The Burgundy put up at the St. George Vineyard is as palatable and delightful a wine as any person can desire. It is really surprising that so excellent a wine can be produced here in California.

THE partnership formerly existing between S. E. Dutton and John Partridge, under the firm name of Dutton & Partridge, has been dissolved by mutual consent. Mr. Partridge has purchased the entire business, and will continue as a Stationer and Bookbinder, at 306 California street. Having also a thoroughly equipped printing office of his own at 42-44 Steuart Street, Mr. Partridge will undoubtedly secure for himself a fair share of the city's trade in this particular line. The work turned out under his personal supervision is the best that can be procured, and his prices are as reasonable as those of any other first-class house. Orders for Printing, Lithographing, Bookbinding, Stationery, etc., may be left at either office and will receive immediate attention.

The late Senator Faironce said of the J. F. Cutter old Bourbon Whiskey that it was the finest ever manufactured. The Senator was a good judge of such things and his opinion holds good even to-day. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, are the agents for this delectable liquid and furnish our leading houses with it.

CANTEEN YARNS.

A MEMBER of the military band at a certain barrack came to the surgeon recently with a long face and a plaintive story about a sore throat. "Sore throat, eh?" said the surgeon pleasantly. "Let me see. Oh, that's not so bad. A slight irritation, nothing more. You'll be all right in a day or two. I think you had better take no risk of renewing the trouble by using your throat, though, so I will recommend you for a fortnight's sick leave."

Armed with the surgeon's certificate, the handsman obtained his two weeks' sick leave. The two weeks had just come to an end, when he met the surgeon on the parade ground. The handsman saluted.

The surgeon recognized the face and stopped.

"How's the throat?" he asked pleasantly.

"It's quite well, sir," was the reply. "That's good," said the surgeon.

"You can get back to your duty without fear. By the way, what instrument do you handle in the band?"

"The small drum, sir," said the musician.

A good story has been going the rounds of a Dorset battalion of volunteers. An officer in attendance at a shooting competition noticed two of the men firing with anything but William-Tell-like precision.

Approaching them, he angrily exclaimed: "You fellows don't know the way to shoot; lend me a rifle and let me show you."

"Bang," and the target was missed.

A broad grin overspread the faces of the two privates, but the officer was equal to the occasion.

Turning to the first, with a frown upon his countenance, he remarked: "That's the way you shoot, sir." A second attempt, and a similar result.

Turning to the other, he continued: "And that's the way you shoot, sir."

A third shot, and an "inner" was fuked.

With pardonable pride the officer returned the rifle, triumphantly, adding:

"And that's the way I shoot!"

The men ever since have entertained a very high opinion of him as a marksman.

SAN FRANCISCO
NEWS LETTER
 California Advertiser.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 9, 1897.

Number 2.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54, Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 903 Boyce Building, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

MAYOR Phelan commences work with the good wishes of every honest and intelligent citizen.

JUDGE Sanderson, in stepping down from the Bench, has the satisfaction of knowing that he has done his duty conscientiously and well.

THE sugar plantations of Cuba are said to be well-nigh destroyed, but the harvest of lies from that troubled island was never more abundant than at the present time.

CALIFORNIA is over supplied with poker-playing farmers and kid-gloved fruit growers. More downright earnest work is needed in the country, and less sitting upon the fences waiting for the "home-seeker" to come along with a pocketful of money.

MILLIONS of dollars are expended by tourists and health-seekers in Southern California each year. With proper advertising, suitable hotels and other inducements, this part of the State would likewise profit largely by the entertainment of travelers and visitors.

THE Health Officer at Berkeley does not receive the support of the local school directors in his efforts to enforce vaccination. These gentlemen are strangely deficient in knowledge. A certificate of vaccination should everywhere be insisted upon, as a requirement of admission to the public schools. This rule is strictly followed in San Francisco.

IN one respect, at least, Santa Clara sets a fine example to many other counties in this State. No less than two hundred and fifty miles of her roads, outside of city and town limits, are systematically sprinkled. The plant for this purpose, including ninety miles of pipe line, has cost $150,000. This is one of the reasons why Santa Clara has such good roads, and why her lands command good prices.

NO less than seventy-two applicants for admission to the bar underwent examination this week before Commissioners of the Supreme Court. Most of these misguided young men would earn a better living by following the plow than they are likely to enjoy for years to come in their mischosen profession. There are too many lawyers now, and not half of them can fairly be called successful.

THE wholesale removals of deputies and other public servants, with each administrative change in the City Hall, is one of the evils of the spoils system. A number of experienced and capable men have recently been dismissed, merely for the purpose of rewarding political henchmen. While this practice continues, there is small encouragement for any deputy to perfect himself in the duties of his position.

THE report of the Code Commissioners contains many good recommendations, the adoption of which by the Legislature would serve to clear up and improve the existing law of the State in relation to various important matters. None of the proposed amendments has, so far, excited much opposition. The Commission seems to have done good and careful work, and its report justifies the appropriation for this purpose.

PRESIDENT Dohrman of the Merchants' Association well says, in reply to Dr. Stallard, that the methods of governing foreign municipalities are not applicable in this country. The chief reason is that politics here prevents the election of officials for their personal merit, the nominations being, with few exceptions, controlled by corrupt bosses. Concentration of power in the executive head has proved to be the best course for American cities.

IN the absence of a duty on anthracite, commonly known as hard coal, its importation has steadily increased at this port. Ten years ago, the yearly imports here scarcely reached two thousand tons; last year they amounted to about ninety thousand tons. This coal comes from Swansea, Wales. Its admission, free of duty, is obviously a distinct benefit to our consumers, but, curiously enough, Congressman Lond is said to have been urged from California to have a protective duty put upon anthracite. This might help Pennsylvania, but where would be the gain to this State?

ASSEMBLYMAN Cntter proposes an amendment to the Constitution to the effect that the death or disability of a juror, during the trial of a civil or criminal case, excepting capital offenses, shall not interfere with the rendering of a verdict, so long as three-fourths of the original number of jurors remain in the box. It also allows three-fourths of the original number of jurors to give a verdict in all criminal cases less than capital, as now in all civil cases. This amendment would cure serious defects in the existing jury system. It should be adopted.

THE British system of municipal government consists in the selection of a large administrative board, with no concentration of power. This has worked admirably in such cities as Glasgow and Birmingham, which are models of good government. But party politics cuts no figure in the choice of aldermen or councilmen abroad. Here the selection of a satisfactory governing board is not to be expected under the present political system. For this reason it has proved best, in American cities, to concentrate power as much as possible—particularly in the hands of the Mayor.

NOW that the new Board of Education and the Grand Jury have determined to investigate affairs appertaining to the School Department, there is every chance that many of the glaring abuses permitted under the old Boards will be stopped in short order. The over-employment of teachers and substitutes, the result in many cases of a pernicious system of favoritism, is apparently the most glaring. By cutting this list down considerably and confining it within reasonable limits, much money will be saved to tax-payers, and a just return of services will be demanded of those remaining and receiving full and adequate remuneration.

EXPERIENCE has shown the folly of making laws against usury. Such enactments were long ago shown to be injurious to borrowers, and merely an obstruction to enterprise and business. Exorbitant rates of interest are justly condemned in the popular mind, but yet more harm is done by legislative attempts to check the gains of money-lenders than by leaving capital to offset the risks of loans by the charge demanded for the use of money. The rate of interest is always proportioned to the supply and demand for money, the security afforded, and various other conditions. Laws never have controlled it, and never will.

THE LAW-MAKING BODY IN SESSION.

CALIFORNIA'S Legislatures have never been things of beauty, much less joys for ever. As a matter of fact, they have too often been ugly, corrupt, festering ulcers upon the body politic. Their members have formed "combines" to extort blood from everything that would bleed, and their methods have been shamelessly confessed in open court, but without anybody being punished. Every material interest that could be harassed by legislation cunningly devised for that purpose, has been compelled to purchase immunity by a liberal distribution of largess among hungry members. Legislators go to Sacramento at the beginning of every session with their grip sack stuffed full of "cinch" hills, supplied them, in many instances, by rascally lawyers who, in the course of their practice, have learned how this, that, or the other interest may be led. The nursing of these measures until they accomplished their purpose, has occupied the time and attention of members to the exclusion of all considerations of public usefulness. It has been as if the Legislature were designed as a mere gouging instrument for the use and benefit of needy and seedy politicians. An army made up of members, lobbyists, attachés, and hangers-on, manages to live from year to year, God only knows how, upon the things that can be picked up around the Capitol at every session. These evils have of late years gone from bad to worse. In earlier days, an outward show of decency was preserved, but when Boss Buckley's reign began, all pretenses to honesty were thrown to the winds, and scandalous bargainings, corruption, and licentiousness ran riot around the legislative halls. It has hardly been possible to exaggerate the condition of affairs. Not a tithe of what happened was ever told, yet more than enough has time and again been revealed to cause good citizens to blush for their so-called representative men. To the shame of this great city, which elects over one-fourth of the whole Legislature, its delegations have usually been the very worst in the pack. Once upon a time, the country members could be depended upon to neutralize the evil machinations of the city delegates, but, as evil communications corrupt good manners, so it came to pass that little dependence could be placed upon enough members to constitute a majority. The Capitol became a place for the purchase and sale of things that ought to be above all price, and California's Legislature became a byword and a reproach among men. Good citizens heaved a sigh of relief and thanked God when each biennial session came to an end.

Is this bad history to repeat itself in regard to the Legislature now in session? There are grounds for both hope and fear. The hope springs from various considerations. In the first place, quite a number of men of ability and character are members of this Legislature, and, whilst they do not constitute a majority, it may well be believed that this little leaven will cause an elevation of the whole. The last election was an earnest one, that betokened a quickening of the public conscience. It would seem to follow that members elected under a revived condition of public spirit would necessarily share in the more earnest convictions of their constituents. Public opinion is not as quiescent as it used to be, and we do not believe that the doings at Sacramento of recent years would now be tolerated. Members will do well to take account of the better spirit of the times, and govern themselves accordingly. A bad record will now bring more odium than formerly. As the members generally realize that fact, they will, it may be presumed, be more cautious. Those who hope for future political preferment will be more than cautious to eschew evil; they will be mindful to be aggressive for the right. If they can return home with the proud consciousness of duties well and faithfully performed, they will be rare exceptions to the general rule of recent legislators, and may rest assured of their ultimate reward at the hands of a grateful people. At the same time, it is to be regretted that there are already grounds for fear in the number of bad hills announced for introduction. All the old cinch hills appear to have been resurrected, and a majority of them are in the hands of members of the San Francisco delegation. The signs indicate that there is already another "combine," or the hope of one. It cannot too soon be ferreted out and exposed; a consideration which forces upon us an expression of a hope that the dailies will be faithfully and adequately represented at Sacramento this winter. They have not always been so represented. A few sessions ago, a majority of the correspondents were found to be on Buckley's list of sinecurists, and at no time have the dailies been represented by sufficient reportorial strength. It is not enough that a long and dry detail of the routine business should be given. Each daily would find more interesting and useful work to do by detailing two bright reporters to watch the ways that are dark and tricks that are vain of the lobbies in both Houses. It is there that happenings occur in which the public are most interested. It is there that "scoops," which so delight the heart of the managing editor, are to be made.

The less disturbance by threatened legislation this session the better. The State is not conscious of suffering to any extent by reason of having too few laws. It will not realize that it has lost anything if not another enactment is added to the statute book this session. In fact, we have already too many laws, and could well dispense with not a few of them. In that respect we are governed too much. He should be esteemed the model legislator who best exposes and prevents the passage of bad hills. As times go, the more ignorant and impracticable the member, the more ambitious he is to add something to an already too plethoric statute book. This fallacious idea cannot be too soon abandoned. If the Legislature would at this session cut down its appropriations to the necessary expenses of the various institutions of the State, levy a rate proportioned to this wise economy, and then adjourn sine die, it would deserve better of the people of California than any Legislature it has ever had, and would live in the memories of men, as well as in the pages of history, as an exemplar and an ideal to representative bodies generally. Without a doubt, our people would wish that it should so do, could they be consulted. If the life of the session must be prolonged to the full sixty days permitted to it by law, let that life be as uneventful as possible. Our people desire to be let alone in their present well-doing, and have no need of heroic laws, anyway.

The The contest now on in Sacramento over the Senatorial choice of the United States Senator should Contest. attract the attention and interest of the people of California to an unusual degree, on account of the elements which enter into it, and the lines upon which it is being conducted by the respective candidates. It has been some time since talent, ambition, youth, brains and eloquence have engaged in a contest for the high office of Senator against wealth, age and mediocrity before the California Legislature, and the spectacle of a comparatively young man who possesses the former entering the lists with one who is generally notable for the latter, may well excite the interest of every citizen.

The career of Samuel M. Shortridge in California, which, through years of gradual growth in public esteem has finally led up to an assertion of his claims upon the office of U. S. Senator, is one which should awaken admiration in the mind of every man who himself has strong and noble ambitions for the attainment of honor and the achievement of success in life.

Mr. Shortridge came to California a poor boy, compelled from his childhood to labor for a livelihood and an education. He worked among the miners of Nevada County until he could earn enough money to go to school. He then attended the public schools and passed through all their gradations until he had fitted himself to teach in the schools in which he had been taught. He thus obtained the means which enabled him to attend a law school, and to gratify his first ambition for a professional career.

The expanding of his natural talents and acquired attainments during this struggle for an education and preparation for a calling, awakened in his mind a new and a nobler aspiration. He felt himself capable of becoming an orator, and began to display a power of moving the minds of men through his eloquent and thoughtful discussions of public affairs. The possession of this talent in a marked degree suggested to the mind of Mr. Shortridge and to his many friends the idea that there was a proper forum for their display, and aroused his ambition to attain, sooner or later, a seat in the United States Senate. For the past several years this ambition has been one of the foremost objects of the rising young lawyer's desire, and he has trained all of his faculties to fill the office with honor and credit to himself, and to the people of California whenever they should deem it fitting to place him there. By deep studies of public questions and of the art of eloquent expression, by wide reading of the best literature of all ages, by close and thoughtful observation of the current of public affairs, and by constant exercise of his abilities as a public speaker, Mr. Shortridge has so thoroughly prepared himself to fill the high office of United States Senator that no honest and impartial judge of his attainments will deny his eminent fitness for the place. The many friends of Samuel M. Shortridge, throughout the State of California, realize that the time has come when his years of service to the Republican Party should have their proper recompense and when his talents and matured powers of thought and expression should be given a proper sphere. They believe that the time has come in the nation when its Senate should cease to deserve the reproach of being a club of millionaires, and should become a council of statesmen. They deem it especially fitting that California which has done more than its share in bringing upon the Senate the former reproach should make a present attempt to restore to it the latter virtue. It is for this reason that the candidacy of Samuel M. Shortridge for the Senate is growing daily in favor and strength before the State Legislature, and is meeting with widespread approval among those who possess a proper conception of the kind of man a Senator should be, and who believe that the State of California would honor itself by selecting one of its foremost representatives in culture and in eloquence to fill the place.

The Governor's Message. Governor Budd's message to the legislature is a long, clear, forcible document, brimfull of useful information and valuable suggestions. A careful reading of it leaves the impression on one's mind that our Governor is strenuously endeavoring to do his duty to the whole State, and that he is bringing to the performance of that task an active temperament, quick perceptions, and considerable executive ability. Not in many years has such a man occupied the gubernatorial chair. He fits the times, and the times suit him. A spirit of retrenchment and reform is abroad in the State, and it is apparent that Governor Budd is in close touch with it. As results of his occupancy of office, taxes are being materially reduced, and this whilst greater efficiency is being maintained in all branches of the public service. Every institution and department has been bettered by the Governor's earnest and intelligent supervision. His recommendations, which are numerous, appear to be all well considered, and are calculated to make for better and more economical government. If our legislators would throw aside the thousand, or more, bills they propose introducing, and assiduously devote themselves to giving effect to the Governor's suggestions, they would find work enough to do for this session, and would make a record in advance of any legislature the State has ever had. Now is the time for the press of the State to be earnest and vigilant in expressing and enforcing public opinion. Our law making body must not be permitted to forget what the people have demanded. Nothing is clearer than that the people desire a low tax rate, and, for the rest, to be let alone to recuperate. The Governor has shown how this can be done, and his lead ought to be followed. The State has been generous to the point of extravagance, and its Government is now practically a vast-eleemosynary institution. It should run its different institutions on strict business principles, which it does not do when it pays twice as much for supplies in one place as it does in another. There should be one purchasing agency for all. Managers and Superintendents should have as little to do as possible with contractors. The Governor's suggestions as to changing the incidence of taxation will cause discussion, but he is right in saying that reality ought not to bear the whole burden of government.

New Light On Funding. The opponents of refunding in Congress are beginning to perceive that there are more difficulties in the way of the Government foreclosing its liens than they had supposed. Senator Pettigrew, having a grievance against the Union Pacific road, has been one of the most loud-mouthed opponents of refunding in every shape. But recent contact with his constituents has furnished him with new light. His eyes have been opened to the fact that the Union Pacific's main line would be of little value without its feeders and side lines. The latter yield more than one-half the total revenue of the whole system, and are not covered by the Government's lien. The Senator now wants the Government to buy the control of the side lines. It appears that there are securities in the market of the value of $10,000,000 which it would be an advantage to buy up, and the Senator wishes Congress to vote the necessary money. Thus a question comes to the front which the anti-refunders have all along studiously avoided. They could not be induced to say, because they did not know, of what use the main lines would be to the Government, or to anybody, without their equipment, terminals, feeders, side lines, etc. The Southern Pacific Company could drop the Central out of its system to-morrow and yet carry on its business pretty much as if nothing had happened. The Government would have a road-bed from Ogden by way of Niles to San Jose, but that is all, except the great debt it would then have to either pay off or renew. For our own part, we cannot see why Mr. Huntington, or any of his associates, need care what becomes of their offer to assume the Central's debts and furnish further security, if time be granted them. The Government has nothing to foreclose worth foreclosing, whilst they have nothing to lose the loss of which would harass them overmuch. We can see, however, and that very plainly, that it is of the greatest consequence to this city to maintain its one direct line to Chicago, and, to that maintenance, its terminals and feeders are indispensable. Los Angeles and the Southern counties generally would be benefited by the abandonment, or even the crippling of the Central Pacific. The line to Salt Lake City would in that case, and in that only, be built, and the port of San Francisco would either be shut off from direct connection with Chicago, or suffer competition with a better route to either San Pedro or Santa Monica. The Central Pacific, by itself, is nothing; as a part of a great system, it is the best available guarantee of the continued supremacy of San Francisco as a commercial entrepôt.

Loans to the Farmers and Other Producers. There is a redundancy of idle money in San Francisco that would soon find safe and profitable employment if only it were sought in the right direction. Because it takes less time and trouble to investigate the title and value of a city lot than it does those of a back country farm, the disposition has been to loan too much on the one and little or nothing on the other. Sound policy would dictate an opposite policy. To make San Francisco permanently prosperous, there is now a pressing need to develop the country tributary to her. That is the way in which great cities are built up. Vacant city lots yield nothing, and of residential houses this peninsula has enough for the present requirements of the existing population. It is well to light up the streets we have, to add betterments to our highways, and improve down-town places of business, but there is little profit in adding to the number of tenanted houses. Money that is invested in dead property is an injury to borrower and lender alike. whereas money placed in productive and profitable enterprises fructifies, increases, gives employment, and, in the end, multiplies homes in this city in the very best way possible. In many of our older States the value of country securities is so well understood that their owners borrow money cheaper than it can be obtained on city realty. Secretary Morton, in his last annual report, makes this abundantly clear. In seventeen States the average rate of interest on farm mortgages is less than that demanded on city residential property. In Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Texas, and Alabama the interest exacted of farmers is less than that required from owners of other realty. The difference varies from one-half of one per cent. to one and one-half per cent. Investors invariably prefer the productive borrower to the one who has city property that may be productive or not, just as it may happen to find a tenant. The Secretary points out that country land values have increased in the last decade, showing that there is no diminution in the security held. We are not belittling city values, but pointing out the surest way to increase them. Build up the country, increase the number of people who produce something, render the employment of capital and labor productive, multiply the transactions of our middlemen, enlarge our industrial population—accomplish all these things by lending a helping hand to country development, and then, as surely as effect follows cause, the Queen City of the Pacific will prosper as never before.

The Mayor's Inaugural. Mayor Phelan's inaugural address has the right ring about it. He speaks with that certainty, clearness, and force that can only come from full and exact knowledge. He renders it obvious from the start that he is well equipped for the creditable discharge of even more onerous duties than those which he is permitted to perform under the existing laws of this municipality. The pity is that the new charter was not ratified at the same time with the election of a Mayor so pre-eminently qualified to put it into successful operation. As it is, it will not do to expect too much from Mayor Phelan. Great as his capacity undoubtedly is, and good as his intentions are, he can accomplish but little under his present grant of powers. Nearly all he can do he has done, in pointing out intelligently and well the nature and extent of the practical reforms which the Board of Supervisors alone has the power to carry into effect. There can be, and there must be, lower taxation, and greater efficiency in the public service. It will always remain a marvel that during the hardest times this city ever knew, the very highest rate of taxation was needlessly imposed, and borne by oppressed taxpayers with a submission worthy of a better cause. A rate of $2.25 on the hundred, yielding a total of $6,896,872, was an intolerable burden that would have resulted in a general refusal to pay in a less law-abiding city than this. When to this is added the sum of $1,630,513, derived from licenses and other sources of revenue, it must be conceded that for a city practically out of debt, the burden of taxation is shamefully too great. If the newly-elected Supervisors take kindly to the well-considered suggestions of the Mayor, he and they working in harmony together will give San Francisco a better municipal administration than it has known in many years. If the Mayor has but little power to do much of either good or evil, the Supervisors are abundantly endowed with the capacity to do either or both. In these days of much civic pride, it will go hard with them if they do not find a way to do less of evil and more of good than their predecessors of unhappy memory.

Reform the Electoral College. The Baltimore American has taken up the question of the inconsistencies in the electoral vote as apportioned among the States, with considerable warmth and much reason. In studying the election returns, The American is impressed with the fact that Maryland cast 250,841 votes, and South Carolina 88,938 votes, on November 3rd last. And yet Maryland has only eight votes in the electoral college, while South Carolina has nine. In other words, each elector in the former State represents 31,355 voters, and in the latter only 7,723. "Where is the justice?" inquires The American. Though the whole country knows why it is so, the question is a very pertinent and timely one, and is by no means answered in the flip-pant reply of the Charleston News and Courier that "they appear to have reduced ballot-box stuffing to a science in Maryland." It has not been charged, and there is no reason to believe, that Maryland's vote was a dishonest one. The State had a population of 1,042,390 in 1890, and, considering the natural increase, the vote cast would be about one for every five of the population, which is the usual estimate throughout the country. The vote was unquestionably normal, and fairly represented the will of the whole people. The census of 1890 gives South Carolina 1,151,149 inhabitants. We do not know what increase there may have been in the last six years, but, upon the figures given, South Carolina cast, or at least counted, only one vote for more than sixteen of the population. San Francisco cast nearly as many votes with only about one-third the number of inhabitants. The normal colored vote of South Carolina, if honestly counted, would be twice the vote that has been returned to the whole State. If this condition affected alone the State in which it obtains, the matter might be left to its inhabitants for solution. But when the vote of a man in one section equals the vote of more than three men in other sections of the country in the selection of national officers and representatives, the wrong becomes too serious to pass unnoticed. If the present method of electing Presidents is to continue, the votes in the electoral college should be apportioned upon the votes cast at the previous Presidential election. There is the justice for which The Baltimore American justly clamors.

A Suggestion From The Dead. Hawthorne's advice that only aged men be sent to battle is worth consideration at this present moment. He may not have foreseen the present Cuban situation.

His prophetic glance may not have rested on the aged Senators who are so permeated with martial valor, but we recommend to these elderly gentlemen and to the country at large that his suggestion be followed. It will be especially attractive to the Senators themselves. It offers them an opportunity to close their public careers in a blaze of glory. History would enshrine their deeds for the perusal of remotest posterity. Accounts of their prowess on the tented field would fix their names indelibly in the rolls of fame, while their jingo resolutions will be soon forgotten. Spaniards are notably an impulsive, impressionable, superstitious race, and when they beheld battalions of hoary-headed wraiths advancing upon them, must surely surrender at discretion. The war would end without carnage. It would be the next best thing to arbitration, and far more satisfactory than the "good offices" they propose. When Cuba was pacified, those of our ancient and honorable champions who did not catch the yellow fever, and those who did not prefer the climate of the ever faithful isle for their rheumatism, might return to receive the plaudits and the pensions of their grateful country. It would be no small advantage, too, to allow the young and vigorous men to remain at home and continue the active development of our resources. This should not be overlooked. The sooner it is carried out the sooner we shall be relieved of the humiliating spectacle now presented by the Senate, and the better it will be for the United States, the Cubans, the Senators themselves, and in short, all concerned except, perhaps, the Spaniards.

The City And County Hospital. The Board of Health has done well in taking a firmer grip on the management of the City and County Hospital.

Heroic action was necessary, and it must be conceded that there is not a little heroism in a member of the Board, having a good private practice, personally taking hold of the management until it can be placed upon a creditable footing. We notice that it is proposed to spend over $10,000 in improving the plumbing and sanitary condition of the Hospital, and no doubt the proposed improvements are urgently needed, if the building is much longer to serve its present purposes. As a matter of fact, it ought long since to have been supplanted by a newer and better structure, and we know of no more pressing obligation upon the New Board of Supervisors than that of making provision for such a Hospital as this City and County ought to have. If we begin to patch up the old building now, we shall have to keep on patching it until more money is expended than would provide a new and adequate structure. It is not alone the sewers and plumbing that are out of order; the floors are rotten and ought to have been removed long since. They have threatened collapse for many a day past. Erected in 1869, when Dr. Beverly Cole was chairman of the Supervisors' Health Committee, the building was only intended as a make-shift from the start. It has seen service far too long. Cold, draughty, and badly arranged in every way, the time has fully arrived when a new building should be provided. A City and County Hospital is the greatest, the most useful, and the most necessary of the city's charitable institutions. We could have done far better without a new Hall of Justice than without a new Hospital.

AT THE CAPITOL.

SACRAMENTO, January 6, 1897.

THE Legislature "has come," and this, the thirty-second biennial session, promises to be the most important held for several years. In fact, more important measures will come up for consideration than most people have any idea of, and, after the Senatorial question is decided next week, both houses will settle down to work, and work they must, unless the members wish to stay in Sacramento more than the Constitutional time—sixty days—at their own expense. It is only right to say, however, that both houses have already evidenced a laudable desire to get down to work, and in this regard the Assembly has made a better record than the Senate.

The economical trait is largely in evidence in both houses, and the lists of attache's have been carefully pruned, and many disappointed office-seekers are now homeward bound, some on foot and some otherwise. That reminds one that there were missing this year many of the old-time place-seekers, who bob up serenely each recurring session. Of course, some of them are dead, but usually there has been any quantity, if not quality, of new material to take the places of the missing ones. The female place-seeker is, the Lord be blessed, few in number—and, by the way, greatly improved in personal appearance. This year they can be classed as few, young, and, to all appearances, decent.

The colored contingent is here, though, in large and black numbers, and every Afro-American eluh in the State has representatives on the ground who are willing to take any kind of a job for any kind of a per diem, and a goodly number have been provided for—of course, after members' sons, brothers, wives, and daughters have been properly looked after.

In this regard it may be said that more legislators this year have provided for their families, who are here with them, than ever before—a fact that their patronage-seeking constituents will not forget when they run for office again, as most legislators generally do.

The Senate is really composed of some very bright men and any quantity of oratorical ability. In fact, when silver-tongued Wolfe, Dickinson, Stratton, Seawell, La Rue, Doty, Brauhart, Bert, Morehouse, Flint, Bulla, and others, less silver-tongued but as valuable, get in action, one wonders whether the few who are not orators can, with the four walls of the Senate chamber also considered, stand the pressure.

To be Presiding Officer of the Senate requires more ability and tact than most people would imagine. Although, generally speaking, the Senate is a dignified, and, at the same time, considerable body, at times it requires a sharp, wide-awake and determined chairman, and from every indication, Lieutenant-Governor William T. Jeter is happily the combination of all these qualities, and it is safe to say is one of the most capable and satisfactory Presiding Officers the Senate has had for many sessions. Although, in the appointment of committees, Mr. Jeter is of opposite political faith from the majority of the Senate, he has already by his fairness and consideration, won the respect of the majority, and has made friends who will not fail to recognize his qualities. Mr. Jeter, it will be remembered, was the Democratic nominee for Lieutenant-Governor two years ago, and next to Governor Budd and Supreme Judge Temple, who were elected, received the highest vote on the ticket. Upon the death of Lieutenant-Governor Millard, Governor Budd chose Mr. Jeter to act as Lieutenant-Governor. Mr. Jeter lives in Santa Cruz, and has for twelve years served the people of both his county and city in public service.

Lieutenant-Governor Wm. T. Jeter.

Senator Thomas Flint, Jr., who was returned to the Senate by his admiring and appreciative constituents, was chosen unanimously President pro tem., and when Lieutenant-Governor Jeter is not in the chair, will be called upon to preside over the Senate. By the way, Senator Flint is no longer susceptible to the smiles of the bewitching maiden, he having married a lovely Vermont lady a few weeks since, and Mrs. Flint is here with her distinguished husband.

Frank J. Brandon, the always efficient and, because of his efficiency, indispensable Chief Clerk of the Senate, was retained in the position. There is no man behind the desk more capable and more familiar with legislative procedure than Mr. Brandon, and his knowledge is always a great help not only to the Senators themselves, but to the presiding officer in particular.

The Assembly is always, probably because numerically larger, and therefore mentally weaker, inferior both in personal appearance and individual ability than the Senate. True, there are some very bright men in that body—yea, some very able men, but there are a large number of what one of the pages calls "nits"—a term both descriptive as to ability and personality. The "nits," however, are never heard of except—if on the Republican side—they forget to provide a job for some constituent, who tells his tale of woe again and again in the favorite gathering place in said Assemblyman's district, and so they do little harm, except drawing their pay. The San Francisco delegation—well, they are all here, and for obvious reasons are bunched up together on the left-hand side of the Assembly chamber. The country members have among them a number of reformers, who, with their panaceas in the shape of legislation for social, financial, and other evils, will have to be tolerated, because they were elected, till the end of the session.

Frank L. Coombs, of Napa, was elected Speaker, and will make an efficient one. S. J. Duckworth, Chief Clerk of last session, was chosen to succeed himself.

The youngest member, and one of the ablest, is A. W. North, of Yolo, who will make a record for himself.

Later, I will send you some photographs and something about some of the more prominent of our law-makers.

"We obey no wand but pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

DURING the first performance of A Paris Tragedy, when Loie Fuller kicked off her little number six slippers, and turned over on the divan, and snuggled close in her white silk nightie, and went to sleep again, I said to my companion: "If you have tears, prepare to shed them now."

I foresaw Miss Fuller's fluish.

Learning that Mr. Peter Robertson was to take La Loie in hand, and cut her pantomime to the dimensions of thirty minutes, I waited writing until I had seen a revised performance. This happened on Saturday afternoon, and I felt then as I had felt before, that Miss Fuller's part of Madame, in A Paris Tragedy, could be better acted by any fifteen-per-week actress from Morosco's or the Alcazar. Mr. Robertson's editing merely curtails the time it takes Loie Fuller to show an audience the sort of a stage lady she would have been without the illuminated petticoats.

I am too sincere an admirer of Loie Fuller's genius in silk and calcium not to deplore this dull, sickening thud upon an art that defies her at every point. She has neither the facile gesture, nor the fleet, fluent facial expression, nor yet the gift of alert, suggestive magnetism for legitimate pantomime. Even in her own sphere of the dance she shows little, if any, personality: there is a tremendous execution art power which moulds mechanism into glorious dance-pictures, giving them the throb of life and color of all radiant nature; but little of the artist's personality is felt with these. Loie Fuller is to her dances very much what Augustin Daly is to Ada Rehan—and, I daresay, in pantomime quite as strange and woeful a spectacle as Mr. Daly would be playing the part of Viola, in Twelfth Night.

Miss Fuller used to instruct the critics. Now the critics will breathe some mild, pedantic whispers to Miss Fuller. A Paris Tragedy is programmed "from the French." I advise Miss Fuller to keep it as far from France as possible. She does not act in French. Carrying coals to Newcastle is a lucrative business compared with carrying this quality of pantomime to Paris.

When I am an old, old man, with dangliug whiskers and doddering anecdotes, every season or two will find me hobbling toward a performance of The Old Homestead, and writing a paragraph about it afterwards. Of this I feel sure. Trilby may be buried a thousand fathoms deep, Uncle Tom's Cabin pass into peaceful oblivion, and Bernhard grow middle-aged, but that dear, old, till-doomsday classic of the barnyard will jog on forever. Fleishy problems have come and gone, flariug melodramas have burned themselves out, kid gloved melodrama has sprung a renaissance on us under the polite euphemism of "romantic" without securiug permanency for any one play, farce-comedy and hair-oiled boarding-house society drama are vanquished in a season—but The Old Homestead, incontestably commonplace, uncompromisingly obvious, and irredeemably pure, skips lightly over the graves of its contemporaries, and year by year welcomes a new posterity.

I cannot tell you why this play lives, why it has survived twenty changes of cast, and now, in the hands of inglorious road players entertains you and me at the Baldwin Theatre. I used to know when I was wiser and younger, but somehow I must give it up now. It would be infinitely easier for me to write why Ibsen (of whom I know comparatively little) is not popular in England, than why Thompson (whose play I know backwards) is foreverlastingly a success in America. Not hearing any clamors for Ibsen exegesis, I will return to The Old Homestead, which has already helped me over considerable space on a dull theatrical week. The old play takes on no fine citified airs because it is playing at the Baldwin. The double quartette sings well, and the cast throughout is most convincingly rural and economical.

Charles Wayne is the particular, transcendent luminary of the four new features on the Orpheum bill. He does not say this himself; he is modestly typed as a "premier eccentrique"—but don't mind that. Mr. Wayne has such amazingly complicated legs that it would be impossible to print them in any language but French. However, nimble legs are only the beginning of his fascinations; he is skillful at song, jests jovially, and his person is dainty and picturesque. He was once in comic opera, but when that business fell into the hands and feet of tumblers and contortionists, he reformed, and went into vaudeville. The transmogrification is perfect: now he articulates in understandable English, his gags belong to this end of the century, and his pyrotechnic dancing is full of novel figures. Charles Wayne is a very entertaining person from the top of his beaver down.

I am disappointed in Hallen and Fuller. In abridging and modifying their skit to what they trustfully believe is the level of an Orpheum hit, they have landed low—leaving, in fact, very little that is either new or diverting. Hallen's sportive tailoring is just as smart and refreshing as it was in his palmy farce-comedy days, and Mollie Fuller soubrettes in the old, usual way, and they both sing and dance airily in conventional music hall style. But somehow I expected more of their fifteen minutes—a brisk duel in repartee, an infectious song or two, and a real uue joke—and I didn't get it.

The Two Bostons are redeemed by the cleverness of their trained dogs. In the tongue of a more refined Boston, they are not worth beaus without them. Bar the dancing of the longer and leaner, which is a good bit of grotesque work, their fun is loud, coarse and obesely British; one line in particular is too stupidly and caudally vulgar even for vaudeville. But the dogs are chaste and clever, and well worth seeing, even at the expense of listening to their masters.

* * *

I missed hearing Miss Caldwell's songs, but I caught Rosner and his band in the act of playing some Faust music. It was beautifully done. He's a great little man, that Rosner; he has address, and piquancy, and magnetism, and authority, and humor, and circumstance, and lots of other things which most variety leaders have not.

* * *

Joseph Murphy was at home, being ill, when I called at the Columbia Theatre Tuesday night to see Shawn Rhue, and his brother John played the part. It's a great thiug to have a brother John—particularly if you are Joseph Murphy, and he looks like you to the very picture, and speaks the same rich, verdaug Irish-American. A less conscientious management than that of the Columbia would have made a deep secret of Joe's illness, and then John would have had a week of being not only Larry Donovan, but his millionaire brother besides, for, outside the pockets, they are as alike as two peas. But Mr. Friedlander was over in Oakland Tuesday night, and Mr. Gottloh would not hear of the deception when I proposed it. So somebody made a speech, and John went on as plain John, and served Larry up in choice, Irish style. There are lots of good democrats in the cast: Mr. Sheehan, Mr. Daley, Mr. Gorrein, and Miss Farrel; and what the others lack in nativity they make up in simulation.

ASHTON STEVENS.

The Old Homestead runs another week at the Baldwin, with an extra performance on Sunday night. A big musical sensation is on for the week following: Lillian Nordica, in company with Sofia Scalchi, Barou Bertrald, J. C. Dempsey, and Luckstone, the pianist, will give a series of three concerts. An act of Stiegfried, one of Faust, and a scene from another opera (it is to be hoped Wagnerian), are to be sung in costume, besides miscellaneous song readings. It is possible that Hinrichs and the symphony orchestra will be engaged for these concerts.

The Orpheum promises a big musical novelty next week, in the Royal Hungarian Court Orchestra, which comes direct from Europe under the direction of Matus. Lieut. Noble, ventriloquist, will also be a new attraction. New marches and new aerial gyrations are being rehearsed by the ballet.

This press agent of Joseph Murphy's is a prose Brown- ing. Listen to what he says of next week's bill at the Columbia.

So long as Irish plays shall continue to attract the attention of those who love the snug little island just this side of St. George's Channel, just so long will Kerry Gow, with Joseph Murphy as Dan O'Hara, retain its evergreen freshness and its thrillingly attractive story. The Irish blacksmith may show his comical dilliance as he interviews his sweetheart's father, night after night, until the "new woman" upsets the habit and renders such scenes a memory; he may make horseshoes and put them onto the horse until motor vehicles annihilate the equine species; and he may send his trained carrier pigeons from the race track to the Drew farm, until Old Erin abandons the jaunting car for the trolley and its tracks of steel; but it is doubtful if ever he finds an audience that tires of the story, its songs, its dances, and its delightful scenery.

Jack's beanstalk has taken on another week's growth. An influx of new songs, dances, and specialties bids fair to keep it green and growing in the Tivoli for several weeks to come. Jack and the Beanstalk is now in the smoothest running order; the many spectacular features are skillfully handled and most of the cast has improved since the opening week. West's Irishwoman and Little Jack Robertsou's Puck are big hits, and of course Hartman is enjoying boundless popularity.

The Rev. Haskett Smith, M. A., author of numerous entertaining volumes of travel in the Holy Land, is at present lecturing at the Y. M. C. A. Hall, on the Orient. The lectures are illustrated by magnificent pictures and views, and the entertainments are proving exceedingly popular. The Rev. Smith will give his last lecture next Monday night on "Egypt." The lectures are delightful, and well worth listening to.

MERITED RECOGNITION.

George R. Fletcher

FEW of the Improvement Clubs of this city have done so much good for their respective districts as that of Point Lobos. The club consists of energetic gentlemen who are determined to make the Richmond District one of the most beautiful in the city. How much they have accomplished will be seen when one compares the Richmond District of today with that of a few years ago. The officers of the club, however, say that to George R. Fletcher, their untiring President, is due the greater part of the praise for all that has been accomplished. He has twice held this important position, and a few nights ago he received a most handsome diamond badge in recognition of his valuable services and leadership. Did every improvement club in this city have such a leader, San Francisco would be the gainer.

AN ARCHITECTURAL TRIUMPH.

ONE of the most pleasing evidences of San Francisco's progress is the building of stone residences instead of those of frame. True, we have many superb houses constructed of redwood, but, architecturally speaking, they are unsatisfactory. No matter how elaborate they may be, they lack the substantial appearance of either stone or brick structures. The departure of W. F. Whittier is a commendable one, and his recently completed home will for a long time be a pride to the city. It is located at the corner of Jackson and Laguna streets, high on the slope of the hill, and its rear windows command the broad sweep of the bay. Built of red sand-stone, on a foundation of lighter hue, and roofed with dark red tiles, reminiscent of old mission days, it appears massive in contrast to its wooden neighbors, yet every detail of curves, cornices, windows, and ornamentations, are pleasing to the eye. The marble entrance leads to an interior in keeping with the outward magnificence. The house will long stand as a monument to the ability of the architect, Edward R. Swain. His success in this instance marks the beginning of a new era in San Francisco architecture.

Sandstone as an Aid to Art.

To obtain soft outlines and artistic decoration is impossible with wooden materials, and even with most varieties of stone, but in the Arizona Red Sandstone a quality of texture is presented which admits of the most delicate carving. The architect has taken full advantage of this quality to give expression to his finest decorative conceptions. The warm, rich color of the stone is so uniform that no streaks or blotches mar the beauty of the structure. The Whittier building is a source of pride to Clinton J. Hutchins, agent of the Arizona Sandstone Company, whose offices are at the Builders' Exchange. The Arizona Sandstone Company is one of the most enterprising in this particular line of business, and has done much toward beautifying this city by the construction of handsome edifices.

Cutting Down a Hill.

One of the difficulties in building on our hills is the securing of a proper grade. The Whittier lot was admirably prepared for the foundation by contractors Warren & Malley, who at present are grading and leveling the site of the old Bay District race track, and also filling in the Fair estate property at Harbor View.

Art and Utility In Modern Appliances.

No residence in these days can lay full claim to elegance unless its appliances possess the highest degree of art and beauty, in addition to their necessary utility. In this respect, the Whittier home stands without an equal. The J. L. Mott Iron Works of New York, reputed leaders in their line, furnished all the bath-tubs, porcelain lined, and artistically decorated with various designs; the lavatories made of Italian statuary marble; their celebrated jet "Primo" water closets; decorated Cauldon China Basins, and Bidets' and Imperial Porcelain Ware for the kitchen sinks, and laundry tubs. In fact, these details are perfect. The New York firm has an office and show room, No. 27 Flood building, where M. S. James, their Pacific coast representative, is ever ready to show their goods.

A Residence Elevator.

Footsteps should be saved in large houses. This mansion is provided with a passenger elevator, installed by the Cahill & Hall Elevator Company, of 214 Mission street. It is a hydraulic ram elevator, noiseless and smooth running, and though primarily intended for passenger service, is of sufficient capacity to raise pianos and furniture. The firm has a number of similar elevators in other prominent residences.

Glory of Rich Coloring.

No small responsibility rests upon the painter of magnificent houses. The conception and application of rich coloring and delicate tints, with full regard to harmonious effect is, in the Whittier house, a decided compliment to the ability of Thomas Downing, of 615 Mission street.

Elegant Woodwork.

The interior woodwork is probably the leading evidence of luxurious finish, and illustrates the high class of work turned out by Fink & Schindler, of 1309-1315 Market St.

Edward R. Swan, Architect

THE old adage says it is an ill wind that blows nobody good. This seems to be exemplified in the fact that the buds are congratulating themselves so heartily over the marriage of Miss Emma Spreckels, because it has removed that charming, heavily-dowered young lady from the ranks of belle-dom, and thus left more chance for their own conquests. Now that Miss Spreckels has become a bride, there remain but two very rich California heiresses—Miss Fair and Miss Flood. The former has turned her pretty back upon San Francisco in favor of New York, and the latter (say her intimate friends) has given up society, and intends to lead a life of single blessedness for aye. Weddings, however, continue in our fashionable world. Miss Lizzie Carroll and Will Whittier have decided upon February for their wedding, and that of Miss Alice Ames and Arthur Allen will come soon after. If rumor may be relied upon, there will be another wedding in the Boardman family ere long, the bride a popular belle.

Sad, pearly tears are bedimning the eyes of some of our fairest women of society that handsome Colonel Lovell has departed for Philadelphia without so much as engaging himself to one of them. "The dear Colonel" has been voted one of the "best catches of the season," and many a pretty belle has had delightful dreams in which he figured as a loving bridegroom. And now, for some unexplained cause, he has suddenly departed for the East without fixing any date for his return! It has been whispered, since his departure—that a previous engagement made in Philadelphia, with Miss Gussie Van Tonne, the wealthy banker's daughter and heiress, bound the "dear Colonel's" heart and affections to such an extent that he was prevented from succumbing to the luring charms and languishing sighs of our dainty belles. Possibly the good Gods will, in a pitying mood, send another Adonis to replace Colonel Lovell, in the hearts and affections of the disappointed darlings.

The guests at the Hotel Rafael are unanimous in declaring that never were holidays more delightfully spent than were those at that charming place. Cozey fireside stories, agreeable card parties, delicious fare, and congenial companionship, made the time pass swiftly by, and the Christmas and New Year jollities were thoroughly enjoyed by all.

There is a whisper in the air that one of the features of this season will be the bachelors' ball, to be given at one of the large halls by the men of society as a compliment to their lady friends. That it will be a brilliant success, should the whisper prove true, goes without saying.

The last fad among our girls is "spouting"—in other words, the pretty creatures have taken furiously to theatricals, and if the craze continues, society may reasonably look for some amateur performances, possibly for a pet charity, before the winter is over.

Dame Rumor asserts most positively that the venerable beau, W. Scott Jones, is seriously considering taking unto himself a wife—a very charming lady, whose social triumphs began at the nation's capital many years ago.

The new army beaux of the Third Artillery are proving very popular in the swim, and, the girls say, are all good dancers. The next Fortnightly will test the powers of these martial heroes, as it is to be an army and navy cotillion.

Japanese curios are sought after the whole world over but in no place can such rare ones be obtained as in San Francisco. The visitor to the store of G. T. Marsh & Co., 625 Market Street, will obtain the best obtainable at very reasonable prices. The store is well worth a visit.

A Book of the Week.* William Wornum, the narrator of this story, is a son of the village tailor, a law practitioner in the Superior Courts of Oconee County, and the brother of Jane. William tells of the simple life of his native village in a pleasant sympathetic manner, and keeps the reader's interest unflagging until he is swept into the matrimonial net and brought to the end of his memoirs. "Sister Jane" is a hard-featured, quick-tempered, sharp-tongued woman, with few of the charms of the sex, except the inconsistency that never deserts it. Yet she has an honest heart withal, and forms shrewd and for the most part correct judgments about her neighbors and acquaintances, who stand in considerable awe of her. Free Betsey, the enfranchised negro woman who tells fortunes by the cards, Grandsire Johnny Roach, Uncle Jimmie Cosby, the revivalist preacher, full of stirring words, and Jincy, the lover of birds, squirrels, and every furred and feathered thing that dwells in the woods—all these are quaint characters, drawn with graphic and artistic touch. Mary Bullard is a charming girl, with whom William has been on intimate terms ever since they were boy and girl together. William, however, is a slow lover, and it takes him a provokingly long time to discover that he is over head and ears in love with Mary. But at last he takes the plunge, makes a declaration, and is at once accepted. Colonel Bullard, the great land-owner of the village, and Mrs. Bullard, his wife, are the most shadowy figures of the story; and people accustomed to the lines of demarcation in British society will wonder how an uncommonly pretty and attractive girl, daughter of a Colonel and man of property and social standing, could possibly be on terms of the greatest intimacy with the son and daughter of the tailor of their own village. We do not know where Oconee county is, but evidently the social distinctions of that region are few and inconsiderable, and are, doubtless, correctly portrayed by Mr. Harris. Some exciting events happen in the village: a child is lost, the Colonel's brother becomes a wanderer over the face of the earth, pulling up at last in California—that wild and woolly region to which the Easterner sends all his scapegraces. The brother and the lost child meet and become fast friends; later, they turn up in their old home, the one a rich man and the other a handsome boy. The story is well told, and the author evidently understands the kind of life he pictures for us. The volume, like all issued from the Riverside Press, is accurately and clearly printed, and the cover is pretty and tasteful.

* Sister Jane, Her Friends and Acquaintances, a narrative of certain events and episodes transcribed from the papers of the late William Wornum by Joel Chandler Harris. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Company. 1896. Price $1.50.

Mrs. Earle, in the course of investigations for her books on colonial history, found it necessary to ransack many old diaries, family histories, and court records. Thus she accumulated a considerable quantity of notes that were not used in any of her published volumes. Such of these notes as refer to the quaint (and happily now obsolete) punishments in vogue in former days, she has collected in this book, which she dedicates to "All curious and ingenious gentlemen and gentlewomen who can gain from acts of the past a delight in the present days of virtue, wisdom and the humanities." Scattered through the volume are curious illustrations, printed on parchment-like paper in brown ink, showing the bilboes, the stocks, the ducking stool, the pillory, and other ingenious instruments of confinement and torture. These illustrations are not so bad as one might infer from the name of their designer—one Hazenplug. We should like to see Anna Shaw and some others of her tribe to be treated to the same punishment as Ann Boulder, who, in or about the year 1652, was ordered "to stand in irons half-an-hour with a paper on her breast marked PUBLIC DESTROYER OF PEACE." And we think it would do the Rev. C. Overman Brown, D. D., (Decies Damnatus, or ten times damned) good to be made to walk round Union Square barefooted, clad only in his shirt, and carrying a large faggot in his hand. At any rate, if it did him no good, it would make us "feel good" to see him thus doing public penance.

Curious Punishments of Bygone Days, by Alice Morse Earle. Chicago. Herbert S. Stone and Co. 1896.

At the exhibition of the Book and News trade in London in October of last year the Macmillan Company was awarded the gold medal for general excellence in book manufacture, including printing, illustrating, binding etc. The firm, which originated, we believe, in the English University town of Cambridge, now has houses in London and New York, and also in Australia. Lately the firm has published two handsome volumes on "The Castles of England, their story and structure," illustrated with full-page plates and many smaller pictures. Owing to the facts that no foreign foe has for many centuries effected a landing on English soil, and that there has been no civil war since the struggle between the Cavaliers and the Round heads, the mediæval castles of England are in splendid preservation. Windsor, Arundel, Warwick, Belvoir, Shirburn, and many others, have been lived in continuously since they were built, and form the most picturesque and delightful residences that can be imagined. Out of the six hundred stone castles of England five hundred remain to the present day, and this sumptuous work aims at recording all that is known about them. The first volume of the work was to have been brought out in November, 1896, but we have not yet seen it. These volumes include only the castles of England; those of Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, will be treated of in other books. The wealth of associations and romantic incidents gathered about these historic castles is astonishing; a single grand stronghold like that of Warwick is worth a whole continent like Australia. To know the lives of its various owners is to know a large part of the history of England.

In an article entitled "The Brewing of the Storm" in the December issue of The Forum, Professor Goldwin Smith makes some valuable comments on the late Presidential election. Among other things he says that the great immigration of poor laborers into the United States has tended to produce two clearly marked classes, that of capitalist employers, and that of factory workers. The latter are naturally discontented, and, under the influence of agitators, become the easy victims of socialist and anarchistic schemers of all kinds. Protectionism is responsible for another batch of evil consequences. Capitalists of all sorts learn to look on the public exchequer as a vast grab-bag, out of which everyone tries to get as large a share as possible; workpeople learn to look to legislation, and not to their own skill and industry, to raise their wages. When a hundred different branches of industry are protected, the silver producer cannot see why his industry should be unprotected; accordingly he besieges the doors of the legislative halls, clamoring for a measure compelling the nation to buy his silver at twice its market value. Hosiers, batters, grocers, bootmakers, brickmakers, dealers and manufacturers of all kinds join in the scramble. All this confusion of ideas is worse confounded by men like Henry George and Edward Bellamy, who, without political, economical, logical or other training, scatter broadcast over the land the wildest notions and the most reckless dogmas.

A second edition of the late John Tyndall's "Glaciers of the Alps" has been issued by Messrs Longmans, Green & Co. It is a charming book, written in a simple and pellucid style that makes even difficult things plain. Professor Tyndall was an enthusiastic and adventurous mountain-climber, whose observations on glaciers and their formation will be interesting to any person who lives in a country where glacial effects are to be seen, and will give him a clearer idea than he ever had before of their origin.

The Christmas Herald, published by Hugh Murphy and Frank P. Scully of this city, is a bright little paper, full of choice reading matter eminently suitable for the family circle. The Christmas number, consisting of twenty-four pages, was well worth the small price asked for it.

BOHEMIAN UPS AND DOWNS.—AFTER FIELD'S WASHINGTON.

'W AY up in a garret high,
Just a few feet from the sky,
Dwell I in Bohemia.
What care I for aught below?
There have I nor friend nor foe!
Pity I the struggling throng
While I live my life of song
Up here in Bohemia.

'Tween my teeth my briar-root—
Best of friends, since almost mute—
Rare thing in Bohemia;
Upward as the thick smoke curls
What care I for simp'ring girls?
Love is weak; my pipe is strong;
Why for love, then, be the song
Sung here in Bohemia?

Off my little songs fall flat,
Hungry? What care I for that,
Fasting in Bohemia?
Put my only coat in pawn,
Live on that and still sing on;
Puff my pipe and think I've dined—
Barmecidal feasts I find Often in Bohemia.

Haply then my rhymelets take,
With a check my fast to break,
Feast we in Bohemia,
'Round the corner of the block,
Sign o'erhead a crowing cock,
Mug of beer and sandwich fine;
What care we how nabobs dine,
Feasting in Bohemia?

Friends have I, some three or four—
Quite enough, for who has more
In or out Bohemia?
With them joy is always young,
Grief is but a song that's sung;
Live we, laugh we debonaire,
Skies are bright and winds are fair
Always in Bohemia!

AFTERWARDS.—JOHN E. HEALY, IN LONDON WEEKLY SUN.

Did I love you, little girl,
Once in other days?
Was the world the place wherein
All the golden ways
Led to you, and all the birds
Only sang your praise?

Did I love you, little girl?
Was it you whose eyes,
Twice a dozen months ago,
Lit the Arcadian skies
Where we walked with summer-time,
Happy and unwise?

Did I love you, little girl?
Are you sure 'tis true?
Was it for your shrine I plucked Rosemary and rue?
Was my pastoral queen of love
You—and only you?

Did I love you, little girl,
Not so long ago?
Can such sudden ebb succeed
Such a passionate glow?
Still I dream of linked lips;
Tell me, was it so?

Did you love me, little girl?
Could such sorrow be?
Have I locked your simple heart
But to lose the key?
God forgive me, little girl,
If you weep for me!

Draining the American Flat.

A proposition is now under way at Virginia City which should merit the support of every one who deals in the local mining share market. Its success will mean the renewal of activity in the Nevada mines and in speculation in this city. The American Flat ledges, which were neglected in years gone by and submerged at the water level in the craze for everything on the Comstock, are now attracting attention. Some of the leading men in the business are now determined to drain this wealthy district by extending the Sutro tunnel through the district at a depth of 1100 feet, the distance to be covered being about a mile and a half. This would tap the old Rock Island, Baltimore and Knickerbocker ledges, which paid handsomely down to the water level, where the companies had to stop work falling the money necessary to put in the machinery required to handle the water. The right people are back of the enterprise now, and it will be hoped that the coming year will see the work well under way, and nearing its consummation. The absurdity of a policy which threw millions down the Comstock shafts, completely ignoring every other mineral deposit off the main lode, is now apparent, but it has taken a siege of dull times to convert the victims of a delusion which has cost them dearly.

California Gold Mines.

The mining fever is spreading badly in the community, and if the dollars are pouring in at the rate they are going down on paper, the town would be packed with the chariots of another batch of the newly enriched, while the beggars would do the grandee act on horseback. A fair sample of the rapid enhancement of mining values, and the enlarged ideas of the promotion class came under notice of local mining men during the past week. A new million dollar proposition cropped up in the street, hatched in the fertile brain of a new arrival from over the border. Running the game down, the owners were finally located, who held the property at $700,000, a drop of $250,000 when the commissions were stripped off the deal. The property in question is a water-logged concern which could have been pulled in a year ago for $8000. The present owners obtained a working bond on it for $50,000, drained the ground and put up a mill. It is now awaiting the foreign tenderfoot, who can take the entire bakery for $700,000, if bought direct. This is a fair sample of the estimate placed upon the intelligence of the coming mine buyers, who, if posted on their business, must feel highly flattered.

The Pine Street Market.

Business in the mining market has been dull during the holiday season. Prices have been low, and the shares devoid of the buoyancy which attracts investors. The mines, however, hold their own remarkably well. The last official letter from the Chollar-Brunswick Mine would have created a stir on the street some years ago. The high grade of ore opening up above the 200-level is a surprise to the friends and supporters of the "streak and bunch" theory, which has destroyed the confidence of the public in the new find. The showing, in face of this unfriendly work of street-scalpers, is better than the Comstock ever made in its infancy, but this is overlooked by people who follow blindly any lead which happens to suit their ideas for the time being. There is a prospect now for more activity in the market, and higher prices are anticipated by dealers in all the leading shares.

It is amusing to learn at this stage of the game that the old Kennedy mine is destined to outrank the Utica. It ought to have opened up a little better in its younger days to attain such a degree of eminence. At its depth, there might possibly be more millions in a sale if the right class of purchaser could be dug up.

MARK Sullivan, a well-known and capable young mining man of Madera County, has accepted the superintendency of the Savannah Gold Mines at Grub Gulch.

A Voice From Westralia.

The following letter arrived in the last Australian mail from Kalgoorlie. It may interest some of our California readers in so far as the paragraph on the famous Comstock mine is concerned. The balance relating to the Paddington Consols will be Greek to most of the boys and girls on Pine street, although some may catch the point where it bears on Charley Kaufman:

MINING EDITOR NEWS LETTER—As the mystery with which the Paddington Consols invest their property is becoming somewhat notorious on these fields, a short account of Mr. Jas. C. Dwyer may enlighten the public.

I have learned that Mr. Dwyer first distinguished himself in the mining circles of California in the early '70s. Through the influence of Mr. Chas Patton, a director in the Yellow Jacket Company, Mr. Dwyer secured a contract to sink winzes, drive drifts, etc., in the Yellow Jacket Mine, on the Comstock Lode. Mr. Dwyer fulfilled his contract in six months, clearing £9,000. In the process of his work he discovered the Yellow Jacket bonanza, and, according to his agreement with Patton, to give him alone information of the mine, he was enabled to purchase shares at low prices, and sell at the highest. He thus cleared £60,000, while his friend profited to the extent of £400,000.

When the public knows this it has the key to the situation, which is that Mr. Kaufman could not have made Mr. Dwyer his manager unless manipulation was intended. Yours respectfully,

CHAS. H. TAYLOR.

Kalgoorlie, W. A., Nov. 10, 1896.

A Prosperous Financial Concern.

The phenomenal financial growth of the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society continues. Every annual report shows an increase in its assets, which have now reached a point close to $40,000,000, placing the bank in the front of financial institutions of its class in the world. The exact amount of its credits on December 31st last was $37,207,801.74. Of this sum no less than $26,190,549.14 is represented by promissory notes secured by first mortgages on real estate, the bulk of which is city property. United States bonds of the value of $4,696,355.84 are held by the bank, and in addition $1,890,866.68 in miscellaneous bonds, consisting of such gilt-edged securities as Market-street Cable 6s, Spring Valley 4 per cents, Sutter-street 5 per cents, and Omnibus 6 per cents. The real property owned by the bank in the city and county of San Francisco is valued at $827,223, including the palatial office building of the corporation. The cash in its vaults amounts to $3,093,342.95, exclusive of the reserve fund amounting to $2,682,099.12. The deposits in the Hibernia have largely increased during the past six months, showing the confidence reposed in its financial solidity and good management by the public.

Local Stocks in Good Demand.

The members of the local Stock and Bond Exchange continue to do a large business in the better class of securities, showing that money is not scarce with investors. An attempt to boom the powder list on the strength of a reported combination, has fallen rather flat, owing to the fact that the public failed to appreciate the situation as delineated by the schemers at the back of the little job. While conferences have undoubtedly been held looking toward the consummation of a compact, they have been arranged entirely by the smaller companies who would not object to assistance from those who are better fixed financially than themselves. To arrange a compact of the kind, concessions will have to be made which are not altogether palatable to some of the concerns which, for all the business now going on, have enough to do to keep their heads above water.

Siskiyou Mine Looming Up.

The extensive gold mountain known as the Quartz Hill property at Scott Bar, Siskiyou County, has just been examined by a party of mining experts, who have carefully investigated its value and merit, and pronounced it one of the most extensive, if not the largest, gold-bearing quartz deposit in California, favorably located for working on a large scale; at least eighty stamps should be erected to begin crushing. M. F. Campbell, who was one of the party of experts that last season examined this mountain, has accompanied this last party as one of the experts. He found the cross-cut run into the mountain, showing new reserves, and felt highly pleased with the results. Siskiyou county can claim in Quartz Hill a most valuable property.

Down Letter

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
 "One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

OWING to the fact that an Examiner theatrical critic made the announcement in headlines last Tuesday, "A Treat at Morosco's," serious inconvenience was caused to pedestrians, and traffic for several hours interrupted in front of the Mission street play house. The news had spread among the free-lunch fiends with lightning rapidity, and the thoroughfare was blocked for a quarter of a mile by a thirsty throng, a large proportion of which swarmed that way from the neighborhood of the City Hall. It was an unhappy error, and should not occur again.

LANGTRY, the somewhat soiled Jersey lily, has a husband who does not propose to be snuffed out of sight by a California divorce court, and who indignantly denies the assertion that he has been supported all these years from the proceeds of his erstwhile companion's income as an actress who has basked in the blistering smiles of royalty. It is indeed unusual to record the fact that a San Francisco divorce suit is to be contested. Mr. Langtry's next move will be watched with interest.

THE Reverend W. D. P. Bliss of Boston has delivered a lecture in choicest Bostonese at the Turk street "Temple," on "Socialism," the Reverend J. E. Scott assisting in the entertainment. Surely we have enough preachers who do not preach, without importing them from the Hub or any other portion of the effete East. What we want is sweet surcease from such noisy divines as Will Do Politics Bliss and Jaw Exerciser Scott. We devoutly wish none others would apply.

JAMES Patterson, Jr. has toyed with the X-ray, and now is a sadder and a wiser man. In his bubbling enthusiasm for science, he has come near immolating himself upon the altar of his devotion to its experiments, and has succeeded in burning enough holes in himself to give him a slight idea of what the hereafter will do to sinners. There is really no need nowadays for a man to roast himself in this fashion. The dailies should not be deprived of their prerogatives.

THE unfortunate falling out of Librarian Peterson, of the Oakland Free Library, with his better half, is much to be regretted. When men of sedentary occupations come into conflict with their spouses, what is to be expected of men whose daily occupation leads them into the path of temptation—such as the clergy, the police, and the holy company of merchants? Mr. Peterson should have kept his marital muddle a secret.

WITH hungry look and itching hand
 Each new Assemblyman doth stand
 Beside the man who hold the sack
 And hopes to bring a portion back.
 Not oft these fellows get a chance
 To fill the pockets of their pants;
 The sooner done, the sooner oer,
 Please God, they'll trouble then no more.

HIS Excellency the Governor is to be congratulated upon having delivered himself of so voluminous a message as that presented to our legislators at Sacramento. Whether these latter can read or not, and in most cases their ability to do so is questionable, a proof is given to the world that Mr. Budd can write. We may be taxed for the printing of the stuff, but that is only an item, after all.

SEVENTY-TWO applicants are clamoring for admission to the legal bar of this State. It is now in order to increase our Almshouse accommodations at once. Poverty is no crime, and we cannot sit by unfeelingly and see our fellow beings starve, no matter how deeply we deplore their lack of judgment.

IT is not surprising that society girls should yearn for the exciting life that accompanies a stage career. The TOWN CRIER's sympathy is wide 'em. Three pink teas and sky-blue-yellow luncheon would send him into delirium tremens, yet a girl is expected to endure such things and thrive, from season to season.

A CHEERFUL heart at present going on out at the Masonic Convention. A gent man with the suggestive name of Bore is stirring the members up to attempt the ousting of the present officers. What the dead men say to the rumpus crowd or above their heads can easily be imagined. It may give them some satisfaction, however, to know that their more boisterous brethren will soon be caught by the heels and hurled into the Great Pit themselves.

BRIUM, the tame brown bear who escaped from his owner and spent the holidays in the fields near Ingle-side, learned to drink whiskey during his absence, and now insists upon a cocktail every morning before breakfast. There is no truth, however, in the rumor that he is one of Swin's bears, being put in training for the editorial sardnet. He is educated beyond the requirements of such a position.

THE ladies of the Educational and Industrial Union are making arrangements to appear in a body before the Supervisors to demand that the City Hall be given over to members of their own sex for purification. Whether the Supervisors will survive this onslaught or not remains to be seen. Some of them, we understand, are exceedingly tough men and can be relied upon to bear the brunt of the visitation. We shall watch for the result with expectancy.

IT is to be hoped the Legislature will not turn a deaf ear to the petition of the workmen of San Francisco that they be granted free soap as an inducement for them to perform their weekly ablutions. Mr. Sutro having kindly placed his baths at their disposal for one day in the week, we feel assured that the condition of the horny mouthed son of toil will be materially improved during the year 1897.

HARRY F. Mann and his wife sought the friendly shelter of the Receiving Hospital this week for the salving of wounds received in a fight, over a pair of shoes, with a shoemaker. The toe of a boot has frequently done active service in altercations, and old shoes have from time immemorial been the price of midnight slumbers, but the appearance of footgear as a bone of contention smacks of novelty.

THESE Mothers' Congresses that meet,
 Some methods new will teach, it may be,
 But all the same it's safe to say
 That in the old, old-fashioned way
 Their slippers will come into play
 When they proceed to spank the baby.

IN case the boodle being distributed at Sacramento might prove too powerful a lodestone for the TOWN CRIER, he has been chained to the NEWS LETTER safe (empty) and will not be granted his liberty until the last of our self-conscious Solons has retired to his inglorious hamlet to blow in his portion of ill-gotten gain.

AN unfortunate street sweeper, who was run over by a team on Market street, intends suing the owners for some $30,000. How comes this particular individual to estimate himself at so high a figure as $30,000? Willie Hearst comes no higher than that.

A MAN cannot expect to have the daily newspapers record the fact that he has a cold in the head, or has sneezed three times in succession, until he has become a multi-millionaire. Such distinction is reserved alone for the rich.

THE easy manner in which several budding politicians presented their Bills in the Assembly goes far to prove that they have all had more or less experience with that fiend in human guise—the dun.

SOME Eastern philanthropists are publishing a journal entitled, "What to Eat." The TOWN CRIER has scratched himself bald over the question: "How To Get It."

WHEN a man is said to be "on trial for his life," the statement bears a literal significance in San Francisco. It takes a lifetime to reach a verdict.

HOW is it that little Willie Hearst has not pitched his tent at Sacramento? Surely he is aware of the presence of a sack in that most holy of cities.

NO wonder it has been so cold of late in San Francisco. All the hot stuff is assembled at Sacramento.

DEAR EDITH: The popularity of lace as a garniture is well maintained. One can hardly say that it is more popular than ever, for the climax of its popularity was attained long ago. The combination of lace and fur is a conspicuous feature of winter fashions. The fur shoulder cape, with its complement of many sable or mink tails, is further ornamented with a fall of very costly lace. Some of the high rolling fur collars or collars lined with fur, have folds of lace laid between the collar and the neck. There are cravat ends of lace which are allowed to hang straight, or otherwise are softly knotted beneath the chin.

Many of the chestnut, Havana, and nasturtium shades have acquired new beauty this season, and are greatly in evidence, and among certain high-class modistes and tailors all the rich browns, fawns and grays are more used than any other colors for elegant, day costumes. Next in favor are the handsome silk-and-wool mixtures, the basket-cloths and boucles in black and colors.

The Scotch tweeds for winter show great variety in design, and for utility uses are made with good-length coats and seven-gored skirts. Costumes of richly-colored tailor cloths have natty jacket hodies made double-breasted over the chest and cut out slightly on the very lower portion to show the points of vest made of white cloth, Suede kid, or decorated velvet or satin. These give uncommon style to the gown.

Military scarlet and rich Danish red are undoubtedly very fashionable colors for children this winter, among these being scarlet cloth coats and Tam O'Shanter caps to match. Entire suits of this brilliant color are brought out both for the small men and maidens, and smart little blouses are made variously in combinations of red and white, red and blue, scarlet and green, etc., some braided, others finished with straight lines of gold, white, or black cord. Plum color, rich brown, and soft fawn shades are likewise used on stylish and picturesque suits, and corduroy and velveteen with trimmings of handsome Irish crochet lace are in great vogue. Pretty lace sets of wide collar and deep cuffs are added to fancy velvet costumes for both boys and girls.

It is very smart to make the dress match the revers. These, if of red, are in tone with the deep red dress. If of gray satin, they match a gray gown, and if of white, they are worn with plain black. White broadcloth skirts are considerably worn. They tone toward gray, and are very pretty.

To meet the requirements of the new style of hair-dressing, many hats have strings which cross at the back and tie at the left side. Flowers and rosettes are not so generally seen beneath the brim, but rest on strings at the back midway between the neck and the hat. The prominent jug-handle style of coiffure is now wholly passé. The center coil comes closer to the head, and often the hair is carried to the top of the head, and arranged en Pompadour in a series of soft puffs, braids or coils, arranged in some original fashion that best suits the face. It is quite the style to again part the hair on the left side and wave it on both sides of the parting. A few women who admire classic modes are arranging their tresses à la Grecque. This is always a most trying coiffure. BELINDA.

WHEN the news reached this city that there was a bog moving in Ireland, and that Ireland itself was slowly, but surely, creeping towards California, there was immense excitement among the Ancient Order of Hibernians. It was proposed to appoint a delegation which should comprise the most prominent members of the Order, to sail out through the Golden Gate and greet the "Ould Sod," somewhere in the vicinity of the Farallones. The moment this geographical wonder became known in political circles, there was a wild rush for places on the committee. Of course, it was understood that the chairman of this committee might aspire to any office in the gift of the State, backed up by this augmentation of the Irish vote. One of the most serious considerations accompanying the reception of Ireland was how the new Hibernians were to be accommodated on the police force. It was felt all around that it would be a dangerous thing to deny them this office, to which their accident of birth entitled them. This difficulty was solved, however, by the clever suggestion of Judge Tooby that it might be necessary to establish trochas in every county to check the invasion of the potato-bug, and that the new and stalwart fighting material the old country would bring, would be admirably adapted for this purpose. It would be impossible to move the Land of Sorrows in through the Golden Gate, and, therefore, some position off the western shore, not too remote from the Cliff House, would have to be chosen. A committee on ways and means will undoubtedly provide for the running of a line of steamers between Ireland and the ocean beach. A small fee of admission will be charged those who want to make temporary visits to the land of their birth, and those who, having heard so much about Ireland, will be anxious to inspect her mountains and rivers, her ruined abbeys, and the lakes of Killarney. The graves of her patriots will be shown to tourists, and huge markets for the sale of shamrocks and black-thorn sticks will be established. Whether the "land of the free and the home of the brave" will be annexed to the United States is a matter which will have to be decided by the party now in power. It is more than probable, however, that the people of Ireland themselves will insist upon a king, and the turmoil that must follow the presentation of the members of the Irish royal families which are scattered all over the surface of the globe, will afford some nice practice in riot drill for the new police force. Again, it will be a matter of importance to the revenues of this State whether the native "potheen" whiskey can be admitted free of duty or not.

The death of J. Ross Jackson has been the immediate cause for the revival of many anecdotes concerning his doings, the recalling of some of the witticisms for which he was famous and examples of his keen and clever repartee. His wit was spontaneous, so much of the point and piquancy is lost in a subsequent narration. His humor sparkled but never burned, and there was no malice in his chaffing. He was accustomed to say that he could never see the point of a joke until the gas was lighted, but when evening came and good cheer abounded he was the life of every party. After others had dropped by the wayside or disappeared under the table, Jackson always remained master of himself. In this respect he was counted one of the wonders of the town. He liked to hear a good story and to tell one even at his own expense. One favorite anecdote was an account of how his wife beat him at a famous game of billiards. The Jacks were among the guests at a Gilroy house party and the weather gathered all the company around the long green table. Ross was an expert player and had instructed his wife and daughter in the game until they, too, had attained a degree of proficiency of which he was proud. Mrs. Jackson confided in the others that she would take "a rise out of her husband and at the same time beat him on the string." On pretense of giving him a new variety of cocktail concerning the ingredients of which he was pledged to ask no questions, she made him a concoction of mescal and bitters. He was given a drink after almost every shot and being unused to the terrible beverage, it soon had its effect. All the guests geyed Ross about his play. "Why, I can beat you myself," said Mrs. Jackson, tantalizingly.

Jackson smiled indulgently at what he considered her woman's conceit.

"Well, I will play you a game for twenty dollars," she said.

Ross thought this a good chance to recoup himself for a spring bonnet and joyfully assented, so confident of winning, that he insisted the stakes should be deposited with a gentleman present. By this time the effect of the mescal was such that his aim and vision became defective and he lost the game by a good many points. He was terribly chagrined and it was several days before anyone ventured to enlighten him as to the direct cause of his defeat.

On another occasion Jackson was entertaining a ranchman who at his home drank nothing but good old Bourbon, to the influence of which he was impervious. Ross ordered a gin fizz and the countryman without the least idea of what the beverage was like said he would take the same. The farmer thought the "Jim Fizz," as he called it, must be a temperance drink so mild did it seem, and he had a number in rapid succession. In answer to his inquiry, Ross told him the drink was named after James Fizz, who had invented it.

"Who is this Jim Fizz?" asked the rancher with growing enthusiasm. "I would like to make his acquaintance."

Ross quizzically eyed his friend, who was in a fair way to become gloriously inebriated.

"You had better look out for him," he warned. "Jim Fizz does up every one who sticks to him."

In the matter of cravats, Edward Eyre is at once the pride and sorrow of the Produce Exchange,—a mingling of joy and envy. He is exceedingly fastidious concerning his neckwear, always adorning himself with the latest product of the haberdasher and it is a matter of principle with him never to wear the same one on successive days. His friends say he keeps a necktie journal, wherein is recorded the date of wearing a certain cravat, which after one day's use is carefully laid aside not to reappear within two months. The men on the floor of the Call Board planned a surprise for Eyre which materialized just before Christmas Eve. They desired to see him so thoroughly equipped that during 1897 he would wear a new tie every morning in the year and all the bulls and bears made contributions so that the total numbered 365. Every donor to "Eddie's necktie stocking," as it was called, chose his own samples and a big grain sackful accumulated at the Produce Exchange of these weird specimens. The cravats constitute a fantastic collection and if Eyre pays his friends the compliment of wearing their gifts, he will be a brave man, but an unhappy one. The loudest colors and most flashy patters procurable are in the assortment which includes all the freak styles known to the furnisher, from a red and green muffler to a yellow shoe-string.

When Francis & Valentine's place was in the claws of the fire fiend; when the flames were tearing the place to pieces, and the water tower from aloft was pouring down a glorious stream of water, up the tottering staircase darted an individual with the fire of heroism in his eye. He did not come to rescue any woman lying appalled and stricken by the peril of the situation. It was not his part to gather in the orphan child neglected by its mercenary nurse. The stream from the water-tower came pouring down the stairway, and in the face of danger, of fire and water, this heroic lad unscrewed the telephone from the wall and fled the ruined building, bearing under his arm the type of his allegiance to that most useful article. He had faced the fire and breasted the rushing stream, and won from the very heart of the conflagration the telephone box.

Following are some of the things the LOOKER-ON confidently expects to see at the close of the year: Father Yorke and John P. Irish swapping jokes over a bottle of good wine and shaking dice to decide which of them shall pay for the cigars, Charles Shortridge and Swinerton riding a tandem bicycle in the Park; Mr. Sutro demolishing the plaster monstrosities at "The Heights," Durrant a pew-opener in a fashionable church; Talbot Clifton back from Europe, and buying more horses from Dan McCarthy; Miss Anna Shaw married and rocking a cradle; Mayor Phelan with the scalps of a "Solid Seven" at his belt; William Greer Harrison tramping from the "Sierras to the sea;" Joaquin Miller with his hair cut à la Pompadour; the "oldsters and the youngsters" of the Pacific Union Club united in the bonds of love and harmony; the "long aud the short fellows" who do all the footpad business captured by the police; large poster pictures and bigger type in the dailies; "Long Green" Lawrence engaged in geological pursuits at Folsom, examining quarries, etc.; the "short bit" financial infamy abolished; Judge Campbell's whiskers shorn down to the roots; Colonel Dan Burns keeping an cigar store; women's hats left with cloaks and umbrellas in the dressing rooms of the theatres; and all the ehurehes harmonious.

OBITUARY.

THE death of Thomas J. Shackelford removes from our midst one of our brightest and most prominent attorneys. He came to California in the early days, and settled in Tulare County. In the early sixties he was elected County Clerk of that county, and subsequently served a term in the Legislature, and two terms as Secretary of the State Senate.

George W. Meade. Another prominent Californian, Geo. W. Meade, expired this week in Los Angeles. For a time he was largely identified with the raisin-packing industry at Fresno, and did much for the towns of Santa Barbara, Riverside, Santa Rosa, Redlands, and elsewhere. At one time he was a leading commission merchant in this city, and built the Meade Block on Drumm street.

George Haas. The funeral of George Haas, the well-known eandy manufacturer and dealer, took place on Tuesday at Cypress Lawn Cemetery. Imposing ceremonies were held at the Masonic Temple, the deceased having been a Knight Templar. Mr. Haas was born in Germany, but came to this Coast as a boy.

THE semi-annual report of the City and County Almshouse, submitted to the Board of Health by Superintendent E. A. Reddy, is most satisfactory in every respect, and speaks eloquently for that gentleman's management of the institution. The inmates are well cared for, and all seem pleased with their surroundings, although the expenditure is considerably within the appropriation allowed. The suggestions of Superintendent Reddy for further improvements will undoubtedly receive the attention of the Board.

PROFESSOR Dupuy, the popular French lecturer, resumed his course of instructive lectures Thursday last, and will continue them every Thursday.

San Francisco, January 6, 1897.

THE New Year was very merrily ushered in, not alone by the crowds who, with tin horns and oil cans in hand, made night most hideous upon the streets for several hours, but at the homes, where jollity reigned and toasts were drunk to the prosperity which 1897 is to bring us. There were two grand affairs at two of the clubs—the Concordia and the San Francisco Verein. The latter club always gives an entertainment on New Year's Eve, and this year, besides the usual ball, there was an excellent vaudeville performance, in which negro specialties, serpentine dances, Japanese, Irish, and Freuch delineations were given; Mrs. William Greenebaum, the Misses Jennie Moore, Alice Greenebaum; Hilda Gerstle, and Alice Friedlander, Julius Kahn, Jessie Triest, and Manfred Brandenstein took part. It was greatly enjoyed and vociferously applauded. Then followed dancing, an elaborate supper, and then more dancing, so the New Year was several hours older ere the festivity came to an end.

Miss Dorothy Hermann was the belle of the Concordia hall. This most popular and beautiful young lady was prettily dressed in white chiffon, trimmed with pink roses, and was the recipient of much favorable comment.

New Year Eve dances were not, however, confined to the clubs, an especially pleasant party being given by Mrs. J. O'B. Gunn, at her home on Clay street, where terpsichore was the chief feature of the evening's pleasure and a merry supper a delightful finale. Another pleasant gathering was the progressive euchre party given by Mrs. J. W. Duttou, when the game, at which some lovely prizes were won, was followed by a handsome supper.

So much for town. In the country, house parties were the rule, and those who have homes of their own down San Josewards had each a number of friends to help them hasten the passing, and welcome the coming year. The Hunt at Burlingame last Saturday was successful enough to greatly please the promoters of the sport, who are confident that it is here to stay, and that time will but increase its popularity. The polo contest on Sunday was also a good one, the Benedicts carrying off the laurels from the Bachelors, who vow the next one shall not be won from them.

Two of the most untiring of our hostesses made their friends welcome early in the year, Mrs. Rounseville Wildmau's tea on New Year's afternoon proving one of the most enjoyable affairs of the kind given this winter. Possibly the reflection that it was a sort of adieu of the hostess induced the large attendance of her friends, and it was very reminiscent of old-time New Year's calls to many of them, save that it was not men alone who called with good wishes, but that ladies were largely in the majority. Mrs. Wildmau was assisted by a whole bevy of charmingly costumed young ladies, who were most assiduous in their attentions to the guests.

Mrs. Jewett chose the second of January for her delightful entertainment, and, on Saturday evening, her pretty rooms were tastefully arranged with Christmas greens and red berries, and filled with friends who enjoyed a most unique evening's pleasure, one of the items being a distribution of gifts by lot, some of which elicited much amusement, and all were much admired. Music and supper were among the other pleasures of the affair.

Of the myriad of pink and white weddings which have been so much of a fad for several seasons past, none have exceeded in beauty of detail the ceremony of last Tuesday, when, at the hour of noon, Miss Helen Schweitzer became Mrs. Samuel Steifel. The marriage took place at the Schweitzer residence on Leavenworth street, where, on entering, the hall presented a beautiful appearance with its artistic arrangement of palms, calla lilies, and white tulle; but the most charming effect was in the long parlor to the left of the hall, which resembled a vast conservatory with its wealth of blossoms, shaded from pale pink to crimson, green foliage, etc. Here, before an improvised altar of pink and white embroidered silks, whereon gleamed innumerable pink tapers amid masses of pink roses, Rahhi Voorsanger tied the nuptial knot. The pretty petite bride's costume was of white tulle over heavy white satin, a wreath of orange blossoms and fleecy tulle veil, and the bouquet was of white orchids and lilies of the valley. Miss Clara Joseph, who officiated as maid-of-honor, wore a gown of white mousseline de soie over white silk; the Misses Cora Miller, Alice Greenebaum, Agnes Brandenstein, and Belle Gerstle were gowned in pink moire, and all the young ladies wore black velvet Gainshorough hats and plumes. Two pretty little maidens, Edith and Florence Guggenheim, acquitted themselves charmingly as flower girls; Joseph Scherburg supported the groom as best man. After the ceremony, and congratulations had been received, the company proceeded to a tent which had been erected on the lawn, where a sumptuous wedding feast was served, and later in the day the happy pair departed on a honeymoon trip, prior to their longer journey Eastward to their future home in New York.

The first sensation of the New Year came in the announcement of Miss Emma Spreckels' marriage to Mr. Thomas Watson, which was a surprise to everybody. The new brownstone mansion on Van Ness avenue, which is rapidly approaching completion, has been regarded as a fitting home for so charming a young lady as Miss Spreckels was thought to be by society at large, and the query which is being discussed by it is, will she still preside at the festivities which are hoped for and expected when it is occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Claus Spreckels? In other words, will she live with the old folks or in a home of her own? In the meantime Mr. and Mrs. Watson are the recipients of many congratulations, and the good wishes of all who know them.

This has been a week of club dances and club entertainments. The Monday Night Club opened it with the second of their enjoyable dances at Golden Gate Hall, at which the attendance was large, and a charming evening was spent. On Wednesday evening the third dance of the Assembly Cotillion Club came off at Lunt's Hall, when Mr. Yanke, as leader, introduced several new and pretty figures in the cotillion. Thursday evening the Thursday Night Club had a dance at Lunt's Hall, and last evening the third of the Friday Night cotillions was danced at Odd Fellows' Hall, Mr. Greenway leading with Miss Caro Crockett as his partner. As usual, the arrangements were excellent, the decorations pretty, the figures danced charming, and the supper delicious. It is agreed on all sides that the cotillion of the season will prove to be the one danced next month, at which a number of surprises are promised in the shape of lighting the hall, etc. Great things are also expected at the next meeting of the Friday Fortnightlies next week, when it will be the long talked-of Army and Navy night. The cotillion of the Saturday Night Club, which was the closing event of last week, was on rather a larger and more formal scale than their usual parties, and proved to be most pleasant. General dancing was first in order, then came the cotillion, which was led by Howard Adams, the figures being all new and original, the favors consisting of fans, bou-hons, etc.

The theatres have not been neglected this week, though theatre parties have not been generally given during the holidays. Now, however, a large number are being arranged for the engagement of Madam Modjeska; an added zest to the pleasure of seeing that popular actress is the fact that both Mrs. Francis Edgerton, who is such a society favorite, and Miss Francis Jolliffe will make their début in the profession they contemplate adopting, Mrs. Edgerton appearing as Queen Elizabeth to Madam Modjeska's Mary, Queen of Scots.

The most economical tea is tea that tastes the best and does most good—if it doesn't cost too much.

Schilling's Best doesn't cost much—your money back if you don't like it.

Sorosis was at home last Monday afternoon, when the club gave a reception at which Frank L'ncola was guest of honor—Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt the only other hombre present. Christmas decorations were of course in order; vocal and instrumental music, recitations, etc., were on the programme, which was arranged by Mrs. H. E. Huntington, after which there was Russian tea and unlimited chat. The ladies of the Century Club, who are ever in the van when novelty is the prime factor, opened the New Year last Thursday evening with a unique entertainment at their club house on Sutter street. It was entitled "An Indian Evening," and the decorations were of a character to correspond with that idea, being curios of all kinds, trinkets, and pictures of Indian life. The speakers of the evening were Miss Ina Coolbrith, Miss Grace Hudson, whose paintings of Indian puposes are so realistic and so much admired, and Dr. Hudson, who contributed many of the curious and beautiful baskets which adorned the walls of the rooms.

Mrs. Geiselman's yellow tea last Saturday afternoon was for the début of her daughter Grace. The decorations were in yellow, acacia blooms taking a prominent place; the young débutante and her assistants were all gowned in white, with yellow sashes and corsage bouquets, and during the afternoon a very large number of guests were entertained, the festivities being prolonged by the young people until a late hour in the evening. Mrs. James Newlands was also another recent tea hostess; her guest of honor, Mrs. Allen of San Jose. The chief guests at Mrs. Michler's University Club luncheon were Mrs. and Miss Brown of Washington, D. C., and Dr. Younger, who has been detained here by the illness of his daughter Alice, filed that role at the banquet given by Dr. and Mrs. Clyde Payne, the other guests being medicos also.

Mr. S. H. Friedlander leaves to-night for Portland, Oregon, on business connected with the various enterprises of his firm. Mr. Friedlander will be absent for ten days after which he will return to devote his time to the interests of the Carnival of the Golden Gate.

The installation of the officers of the Franco-American Lodge to-night at Odd Fellows' Hall, will be celebrated by an invitation ball. The grand march commences at 9 o'clock. No return checks!

The wedding of Miss Bertha J. Hart and Mr. I. W. Cahen takes place January 17, 1897. Only the immediate family will be present at the ceremony.

The Fred Sharons and Miss Lena Blanding are said to be on the eve of a return to California.

NO champagnes are so rapidly coming into favor today as the "Haraszthy Brut" and the "Haraszthy Dry" brands. Not only are they well patronized here, but they have proved themselves universal favorites in Europe, owing to their unsurpassable qualities. At several exhibitions the wines have been awarded the highest prizes and their popularity is ever on the increase among connoisseurs. The drinker of good wine is ever on the lookout for an improvement, and in these brands he will find it.

The HILL-TOP FARM

By Elizabeth Gelbeiding.

"PEARS ter me thet Adsom's would be the best way ter git there." The speaker was the last of many who had drawled out an opinion. The person addressed, a tall muscular Englishman, gazed at the circle of faces before him. He was slightly puzzled. He had taken advantage of a holiday to travel the one hundred miles intervening between San Francisco and Cloverville, in search of timber land which he had purchased several years previously without having seen it. His arrival in Cloverville had been the cause of considerable excitement. Twenty-five miles off the railroad in California means comparative barbarism, and there was an unmistakable out-of-the-world flavor about the place. The natural advantages of the little settlement were of the finest. Every afternoon a gentle breeze blew inland from the west, so punctually that its advent was as much looked for as the rising or setting of the sun. In spite of these advantages the hamlet had not grown perceptibly in forty years. The high range of hills which separated it from the railroad—symbolical of civilization and the world—seemed to guard it with a conservative jealousy that opposed progress in any form. The hotel, which with the blacksmith's shop, one store and three saloons, comprised the business portion of the town, was most primitive. Harraden ate a wretched dinner and was glad to leave the dining room for the office,—a bare room, unfurnished with the exception of a cast iron stove and a few hard chairs,—where he propounded a few questions to mine host.

During the conversation he was conscious that faces were peering in at the windows and figures were slipping into the room. Before long every male inhabitant of the village from half grown boys to tottering old men surrounded him in a hypnotized circle.

"I calc'late the best way would be by the P'int Sand road," drawled an old man in faded blue denims. "Ef Cat Crick and Moss Crick jine on your land, it'll be 'bout eight miles right up Clear Crick ter git to it. I come here in '45," he added with a touch of pride, "and I calc'late I ought ter know this section pretty thoroughly."

"Eight miles," George Harraden repeated. He turned to the first speaker. "And you say it is five miles to the place on the top of the mountains, and two miles beyond to the land?"

"'Bout that, I call it, from Adsom's." The oldest inhabitant gave a sniff of disgust. In the opinions expressed the distance had varied from three miles to ten.

Mr. Harraden arose. "I'll walk it by the mountain road and ascertain the correct distance," he said.

"Better tell him suthin' 'bout Adsom, then," an old man suggested to the host. The latter nodded and explained.

"You see, Adsom's hen queer fer some leetle time. Jest wheels, I say. He aint zactly crazy, though folks thought so at oue time and went up there ter git him fer ter shet him up. They found him a plantin' corn, as sane as any of 'em; and sence then folks hev let him alone. But he has sort of spells like when he's most an idjit. Jest sets 'round queer like, or gits up on the highest pint of laud he's got, when he sees anybuddy a-comin'. I think it's livin' on nothin' much 'cept coffee that's done it. Ef you strike him when he's feelin' all right, why, like enough, he'll show yer the way ter your property. But ef he's queer yu jest keep right on past his house—the waggin road stops there—but there's a trail what runs past the sody spring and Dobson's old house. It runs 'long the ridge a ways and then drops down to the crick on t'other side."

"Is there anyone living in Dobson's house?"

"No, nor aint been this ten year. Yer see 'twas one of them houses jest built ter file a homestid claim on the land, and then left. You can't miss the place where the cricks jue. Don't know as anyone hez seen old Adsom lately. Ike!" he called to a faded personality that, apparently, was glued to the door post, "hevn't seen nothin' of Adsom lately, hev yer?" The faded personality shook its head. "Hevn't seen anyone who hez, hev yer?" Again the shake of the head in scared pantomime.

"I wuz up thar," a small voice piped. The owner was a slip of a boy, tow headed and forlorn, but possessed of a pair of keen, bright eyes.

"You wuz, Eh? When?"

"Went over thet thar way a-fishin' last week."

"Waal, yer seed Adsom then, I reckon?"

"No. I reckoned I didn't want ter, neither."

"Why not? Aint afeared of thet harmless old critter, be ye?"

"Waal, I went inter the house 'n he wasn't thar, but I see suthin' thar thet made me git out pretty quick."

As if by one impulse the little group closed in around the speaker. Curiosity was written on the faces. The boy enjoyed the situation and was in no haste to draw it to a conclusion.

"Waal waal, youngster, tell us what 'twas you see!" said his questioner impatiently.

"I see," the boy began with impressive slowness, "I see a-lyin' on the table a San Francisco paper not more'n two days old, and old Adsom's specs covered with dust a-hangin' up on the wall."

The questioner smiled incredulously. "Fer a youngster, you allus were a good hand ter yarn it," was his comment. "Reckon you wouldn't mind yarnin' 'bout the date of the paper. Anyhow, Adsom's queer."

"He aint queer enough ter read without his specs," remarked the landlord. "But you couldn't miss the trail ef you tried," he added turning to Harraden, "'cause it's the only one there is."

Thus directed George Harraden set forth. With his long English stride he soon left the village far below him as he climbed the first rolling spurs of the ridge. There was something quaint about the place in spite of its crudeness. There was a charm which the railroad town, for all its boasted daily connection with the city, could never possess. The scattered shake houses, with their mud and stick chimneys and dooryards gay with poppies had a charm of their own.

The road became steeper as he ascended. When it turned he could get an occasional glimpse of a patch of pale green far above him on the summit, that he knew marked Adsom's oat field. This spot was a little to the south from his position, and he began wishing that he could reach the top of the ridge directly above him. He fancied that, could he do so, he would be able to see the junction of the two creeks on the other side. A rough life in Australia and South America had bred a contempt for heaten tracks, and he soon struck upward through a grove of madrone and redwood. A sudden sharp pitch brought him to the top, where, as he had thought, he could view the country on both sides. A few yards southward brought him to the edge of a slope and he threw himself down under a tree to rest.

Directly below him, not a hundred yards distant, was the little mountain farm house surrounded by its tiny orchard and grain fields. The place was a gem. There was a coziness about the way in which it nestled in the little hollow; yet it commanded a view on one side of the houndaries of half a dozen counties.

"It is the embodiment of peaceful rest, this breezy, hill-top little farm!" George Harraden exclaimed. "One could live here and let the world go by." And then he began to speculate, inconsistently, on the dull life of the owner. His former idea that the early settlers of California were all millionaires was somewhat shaken. "Fancy a man's coming here in '45, getting land for the trouble of taking it up, and being poor to-day!" he said to himself in wonder. The thought was barely expressed he-fore a figure appeared in the doorway of the house. It was that of a man, spy-glass in hand, who seemed to be scanning the country in the direction of Cloverville. Harraden fancied from his movements that he was carefully surveying the road by which he had come. The man advanced to the edge of the porch and Harraden could not but note the elasticity of the youthful figure, which belied the stock of stow white hair. "A few minutes more and I'll go down and make his acquaintance," he said to himself, lazily. "I must have a drink from that spring which I know bubbles, crystal clear, under that willow by the porch."

Suddenly, the man disappeared in the house. When he returned he no longer held the spy-glass, but in its place was a revolver.

After carefully cleaning and loading the weapon, he placed it in his pocket and, grasping a hoe which leaned against the porch, he ran like a deer to the steepest part of the cornfield. Harraden watched this performance with considerable curiosity. "Some one is coming, evidently," he concluded.

Presently there came in view a lean country boy riding a mule bareback. He hallooted to the old man several times before the latter gave any sign of having heard. "Aint seed a stray black heifer hereabouts, hev yer?" the boy shouted. Adsom shook his head and went on hoeing industriously. Harraden noticed that his back was bent and that he limped painfully when he moved a few steps. The boy turned the mule's head and returned the way he had come. Adsom hoed on for a few minutes and then he sprang down the hillside and entered the house. There was something so queer about the man's actions that Harraden resolved not to disturb him. He could see the trail leading along the ridge, and he decided to make his way to it through the timber.

It was beautiful in the wood. With his English ideas it hardly seemed possible that it could be Christmas. The redwood had put forth pale green tips from all its outspread leaves. Clusters of the scarlet berries of the toyones,—the Christmas berry of California,—contrasted beautifully with the gray boughs of the buckeye. The brilliant red bark of the madrone shone as if freshly varnished, and the darker red of the manzanita gleamed like old mahogany. The sun was warm in the open spots where it shone on the young green grass. It was not winter. In California one season masquerades as each one of the four in turn. Was it fancy that made Harraden turn several times with the feeling that he was being followed? He saw nothing, yet the idea that a shadow slipped along behind him from tree to tree, recurred constantly. Was it a premonition that brought to his mind the old warning, so familiar to him in Buenos Ayres: "Never allow a man behind you to approach nearer than fifteen feet?"

After a little the trail plunged suddenly down a steep ravine, and he could see the frame of an unpainted house just ahead. At his feet a coppery deposit on a little rocky basin told him that he had reached the soda spring. He drew a traveling cup from his pocket and stooped to fill it, when something whizzed by his head. He dropped the cup and sprang behind the giant trunk of a laurel. Although armed, he was at a great disadvantage, as his enemy was almost directly above him on the steep hillside. The deserted house was a short distance through the trees and he resolved to run for it. Two more bullets sped after him as he dashed for the shelter; but, with the exception of a slight flesh wound on the left hand, he was unharmed. The house, gray from exposure to the weather, was without doors or windows, the merest broken shell of a dwelling. There were chinks in plenty, and through one of these Harraden watched the trail. That his assailant was old Adsom and that he was crazy he did not doubt, but he felt he must protect himself. He soon discovered the figure slipping along the wood above the house and he fixed upon a spot where he must pass a longer opening between two trees. He aimed low, not wishing to do more than disable him. The man fell with a cry of rage and Harraden saw, by his efforts to rise, that his leg was broken. "Poor fellow!" he exclaimed. "He did not know what he was doing."

A slight sound behind him made him turn his head, and the sight that met his gaze nearly stunned him. A figure stood in the doorway of an inner room, the counterpart of the man he had shot. "Who are you?" Harraden gasped. He noticed that the man was chained to a post driven into the earth floor. The look of terror on the captive's face gave place to a vacant smile. Then the truth flashed upon Harraden. This must be the real Adsom and the man who had followed him must be his impersonator. A recollection of the strange conduct of the latter at the farmhouse confirmed this suspicion. A glance at the wounded man showed his helplessness, but remembering that he was armed, Harraden resolved to make a wide detour and strike the trail further up the canyon. When he had told his story to the landlord of the Cloverville hotel the latter said one word, "Mullen!" that in a short space of time was repeated from one end of the country to the other. Men left plough and horses standing in the furrows to hasten to the scene. The story of the terrible murder of three persons, some months previously, was retold; and the futile efforts of sheriffs and citizens throughout the State to apprehend the murderer, were recalled in detail.

When they reached him he had been dead for some time, shot through the heart. His face had been cleverly made up in imitation of old Adsom, and beside him lay a wig of bushy white hair.

"Who'd a thought it!" ejaculated the landlord. "Ike and Miller's boy hev ben by and spoke ter him a dozen times, and never knowed they wuz passin' their fortin by. That ere ten thousand dollars reward'll be quite a tidy leetle sum, Mr. Hairdon." He drew a sigh. "But he's gone and beat us a-killin' hisself. I wanted ter see him hang fur it. What I can't make out is why on airth he didn't kill thet thar ole idjit? Food's ben carried ter him reg'lar. Must hev ben some idee he'd got 'bout compensation—his lettin' him live aud carin' fer him,—when he could hev killed him jest as well as not."

In response to many inquiries from all parts of the country about the Railway and Dock Construction Company

The officials hereby give full information in regard to the company, its business and prospects.

The company offers 20,000 shares of stock for sale in lots to suit purchasers at $20 per share. The par value is $100 per share—full paid and unassessable—stockholders have no individual liability whatever. The company has no indebtedness of any kind—is in solid financial condition—and, as there are no bonds nor mortgages, all the earnings go to the stockholders.

The adoption of this Company's system of construction by the United States Government, or any Foreign Government, or by any one of the large cities in America or Europe will cause the stock to rise above par ($100) immediately.

The most conservative investors, old shrewd bear operators on the stock exchange, have bought this stock and confidently predict it is sure to pay large dividends and sell at over $200 a share as the Railway and Dock Construction Co. commence business under much more favorable conditions than did the Bell Telephone Co., whose stock rose from about $10 to over 200; or the original Edison Electric Co., whose stock rose from 45 to $3000 a share, or the many other companies owning useful inventions whose stocks rose rapidly in value while paying large dividends to the alert original investors.

Many prominent men in banking, railway and financial circles and other expert judges of stock values predict that this stock will pay large dividends and will sell at over $200 per share for the following reasons:

The Railway and Dock Construction Company controls all the rights, titles, patents and interests in and the sole, absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell the new indestructible piles that do away altogether with the millions of wooden piles heretofore used everywhere, which only last a short time, as alternate moisture and drying and the marine worms soon destroy the wood, and leave a deceptive shell, incapable to sustain a load that requires the full strength of the original pile. Old wooden piles must be continually replaced at great expense.

Nothing can compete with the indestructible Pile in the construction of piers, docks, bulkheads, sea-walls, foundations for bridges, lighthouses, jetties, breakwaters or other improvements in rivers, harbors or on the sea coast.

This pile is an absolute necessity in railway trestlework as it guarantees safety, and it will last forever, and there is an enormous demand for it.

One defective wooden pile derailing a train causes a loss of many thousands of dollars in lives and property destroyed.

Applications are pouring in from engineers, contractors and railway officials all over the United States. These men are quick to see the certainty of profit. They are perhaps better able to judge than others, because, out of a total of 1891 railroads, 373 of these railway companies are now preparing to build 20,547 miles of new line. The great superiority of the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system of solid, substantial, indestructible trestle work is causing the demand in this special field.

Estimated earnings from this one source of profit will pay $7 per share annual dividends—this is equal to 35 per cent. cash dividends per year on stock bought now at present price of $20 per share.

Other and larger sources of profit will come from contracts now in view, viz:—

In place of the old wooden docks, covered by temporary sheds, which now disfigure the water fronts of our cities, this company will build solid, indestructible piers, on which permanent iron, stone or brick buildings are put up just the same as on land.

Private owners of dock property as well as dock officials in the numerous cities are becoming aware of the great advantage of using the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system of building indestructible piers to make a solid foundation, upon which large buildings can be erected, from which they can get big revenues for rentals, etc.

$27,000,000 have already been expended in improving Southern harbors and their approaches.

In projects now under way over fifty million dollars will be spent in improving navigation in rivers, bays, etc., throughout the country on jetties, breakwaters, and other work in which the indestructible pile is a great necessity.

The city of New York is spending $5,000,000 a year improving the city water front.

In a private conversation Hon. J. Sergeant Cram, ex-President of the Board of Dock Commissioners said: "There is an immense fortune in this company's system of construction."

The U. S. Senate Committee have recommended the expenditure of eighty million dollars for the protection of our seacoast. About ten millions a year will be spent during the next eight years.

The United States Government spent about $10,000,000 in deepening the entrance of the Mississippi to divert tidal action by old style work, which will be supplanted in future by the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system. $5,000,000 has already been expended on the two immense jetties in the bay at Galveston: they are simply loose rock dumped into the water. Each jetty is about 1 1/2 miles long and forms a continuous pyramid 100 feet wide at the bottom, tapering to 15 feet wide at the top above the water. The Railway and Dock Construction Company build indestructible jetties of the same size at the bottom as the top and save this enormous waste of stone and labor.

The "St. Louis Critic" strongly advocates the adoption of this company's system of indestructible jetties to deepen the Mississippi at St. Louis.

To provide additional funds to execute some of this work, the company offers 20,000 shares to the public in lots to suit at the low price of $20.00 per share in order to have the stock quickly taken. There are no salaried officials. The money derived from the sale of stock, when not used in profitable construction work, remains in the company's treasury.

Many leading marine engineers and experts say: "This company's system of construction is coming into universal use in building all improvements in rivers and harbors."

As the business in sight is too large for this company to handle alone, the subsidiary companies now being organized in the principal States each pay a certain amount in cash and one-third of their capital stock into the Railway and Dock Construction Co.'s treasury. In addition to large sums in cash the company will receive about $20,000,000 in securities in this way, on which dividends will be paid from the earnings of the subsidiary companies. These dividends all go to the holders of Railway and Dock Construction stock.

With a large surplus and an ample cash working capital the company will hold assets of $200 per share for each share now offered at $20 when all details are completed.

Application will be made to list the shares on the stock exchange.

Owing to the financial depression and uncertainty before the election the Railway and Dock Construction Company would not accept numerous contracts for work amounting to about three millions of dollars. They were offered first mortgage bonds in payment but the bonds could not be sold at that time in New York or London at satisfactory prices. English bankers are now negotiating to purchase a large block of Railway and Dock Construction stock and apply for an official quotation on the London Stock Exchange.

The officials and large stockholders are well-known practical financiers and business men, whose names are at once a synonym for trustworthy, capable management and a guarantee that any stock in which they invest is safe, solid and profitable. Among them are:

Among the stockholders are:
 Geo. W. Dunn, Esq., president of the company, head of the banking house of George W. Dunn & Co., New York, and president, director and trustee of other corporations; he has been prominent in Wall Street for 20 years as a careful level-headed financier; Hon. Thomas Murphy, vice-president, ex-Senator, Collector of the port of New York under President U. S. Grant; R. A. B. Dayton, Esq., counsel for the company, Temple Court, New York; Eugene Harvey, Esq., second vice-president, banker, Drexel building, Philadelphia, Pa.; R. M. Stanbrough, Esq., Kingston, N. Y.; George D. Hilyard, Esq., contractor, N. Y.; W. R. Childs, Esq., of the Calumet and Hecla Copper Company, Calumet, Mich.; Edward A. Wilson, Esq., secretary; M. Hoff, assistant secretary; George B. Y., and several rich and influential railway and political magnates who will have seats in the Board of Directors later on.

Address all applications for stock and remit for the number of shares wanted to the Financial Agents of the company, Messrs,

GEO. W. DUNN & CO.,

WHY HE PROPOSED.

"Well," said Miss Hungerford to Mr. Gildersleeve, as they sat on the piazza of a summer hotel and looked about them, noting the other guests with critical eye, "when I am married—if I ever am married—I shall not march straight from the altar and put myself on exhibition at a summer resort." "That is a commendable resolution," replied Mr. Gildersleeve. "Just notice the three or four honeymooning couples at this hotel now." "I've noticed them, and, do you know, I've rather envied the bridegrooms." "Have you? Well, I haven't envied the brides. I don't believe in public lovemaking either before or after marriage." "The honeymooners here seem to enjoy it, and it furnishes a great deal of amusement to some of the old married people." "Well, no one will ever obtain amusement at my expense in that way," Miss Hungerford went on. "I consider newly wedded affection too sacred a thing to be put on exhibition." "Of course you are right, Miss Hungerford, precisely right." "Now, when I am married," Miss Hungerford proceeded, "I am going straight to my dear old aunt's place in the Catskills. It's the finest retreat imaginable in the hot summer days. I usually go there to rest up after a month at the shore. Perfect solitude you know, the nicest cottage, with well-trained servants. You can lie in the hammock all day long and breathe the most delicious air. Then you can row on the dearest little lake, and take the most delightful walks, with no danger of anybody's intruding on your privacy. When I was there last summer, aunty dear said: 'Now, Annie, when you get married, I want you to come straight here with your husband and enjoy your honeymoon as it ought to be enjoyed. You and he are welcome to stay a month, or two if you like; the longer the better.' Now, don't you think it would be much better to spend a honeymoon in a place like that than at a crowded watering place like this, Mr. Gildersleeve?" "Indeed, I do, Miss Hungerford." He moved nearer to her and added: "Annie, love, let's start right away." "Oh, George, this is so very sudden! I'll need at least two weeks to get ready for the wedding." She was ready in time, however, and now they are at her aunt's.—Harper's Bazar.

OUR fruit growers are finding out that robins are among their best friends. These birds, if unmolested, may do the State more good than a costly Horticultural Commission.

THE Rev. George Swan of Berkeley very sensibly objects to the study of classic mythology in the public schools. Bulfinch's "Age of Fable" is a highly interesting book, but something more useful should engage the attention of the pupils.

INTEREST in the Nicaragua Canal project seems to be reviving at Washington. There is a prospect that a measure will be adopted at this session, calling for a re-survey of the canal line, with provisions for construction work under the direction of the Government.

IT is announced that an important move has been made in Judge Coffey's court, as a result of which a speedy settlement will be reached of a large estate. This move must have been an oversight on the part of the attorneys, but such things cannot always be guarded against in the practice of law.

IT was an absurd thing to close the public schools for half a day, on account of the death of School Director Halsted. He had never served in that capacity, and even if he had been a life-long member of the Board there would be no occasion for wasting the time of teachers and children in this manner.

IT is to be hoped that Senator Proctor's proposed constitutional amendment, increasing the Presidential term to six years, and making the President ineligible for re-election, will be approved by Congress and ultimately become law. It also increases the term of Representatives to three years, which is likewise a desirable change.

IN the unholy scramble for tariff benefits at Washington, nearly all interests appear to be clamorously represented, except those of the consumer. If this State has to submit to an increased duty on coal, it will go far to neutralize any gains that may be made through higher duties on fruit. San Francisco, in particular, must suffer from dearer coal.

IN insisting that the Grand Jury has no right to inquire into the expenditures of the school department, with the view to detect extravagance or waste, Superintendent Babcock has but excited suspicion against the school Board. If the public money is being wisely expended, there is no reason why the Grand Jury should not be allowed to make known that interesting fact.

A KANSAS legislator has framed a bill designed to prevent any man from owning more land than may be embraced in a homestead. It authorizes anybody to make a tender of money for land, other than a homestead, and if the offer is refused the proper amount is determined in court by a jury, which sum the owner is obliged to accept. This is lending the power of eminent domain to take private property for private uses, and is clearly in conflict with the federal constitution.

THAT a son of Abraham Lincoln, the most truly democratic, in a social sense, of all our Presidents, should become the leader of the most exclusive set of Chicago's society, is a striking example of the mutability of families in America.

THE outrage at Orangevale, in Sacramento County, where six Japanese laborers were strung up by the neck and nearly killed, by a mob of white ruffians, was most disgraceful. Such cowardly assaults on inoffensive foreigners cast infinite discredit upon California. The newspapers that falsely represent our labor interests as endangered by the Japanese are the chief promoters of this sort of mischief.

NO great degree of enthusiasm has been excited by the memorial asking Congress to establish a leper hospital in this State. There seems to be need of such an institution somewhere in the United States, but San Francisco are certainly not anxious to have it established in this neighborhood. This is not from fear of infection, but because of the gloomy associations that must always surround a hospital of this sort.

THE Populist Party is shouting for greenbacks as the cure-all of financial ills. Its leaders declare that they took up the silver fight as the entering wedge for their main issue of paper money. The proposed retirement of the greenbacks in circulation will give the Populists opportunity for talk on this subject. But it is quite certain that the fiat money idea has no strength in Congress. The country is in no danger from this sort of visionary finance.

THERE is not so much need of more courts in California as of a reform of legal procedure by which a final determination of law suits could be speedily obtained at reasonable cost. The law's delays are proverbial, but most of them are needless and inexcusable. It is probable that more substantial justice was had in the old English market-place courts, where every cause was finally decided on the day it arose, than is attained through the complicated machinery of our modern courts.

THE Bates dredger, which has proved so effective on the Mississippi river, differs chiefly in the matter of capacity from the Bowers or Von Schmidt dredger, well-known in California. The principle of stirring up the bottom, and lifting the liquified mud by suction, is the same in both. It is not unlikely that the Legislature will appropriate a sum sufficient for the purchase of a big dredger of this sort, to be used on the Sacramento river. It would be a good investment for the State.

THE prominence given the arrest of Murderer Butler, by the sensational portion of the daily press, must be an eye-opener to the foreign officers who are mixed up in a hurly-burly of excitement which must be new to them, considering the matter-of-fact manner in which these affairs are handled in other parts of the world. Keeping the unfortunate strangers cooped up in uncomfortable quarters on a wharf, with telephonic communication available with all the hotels, is not the least ridiculous feature of the situation. Moreover, instead of sending a revenue cutter out to herald the arrest of a "dangerous man," it would seem that the pilot boat could have simplified the whole matter by a letter of instructions to the captain of the vessel, who, between the cruising ground and the coast, could easily find an opportunity to clap the unsuspecting murderer in irons, for safe delivery to the police in waiting.

THE FUNDING BILL DEFEATED.

A FRAID to deal conservatively with a measure in which large money interests were involved, and in regard to which the possibilities of suspicion and scandal were great, the House of Representatives has defeated the Pacific Railroads funding bill. From a California standpoint, we continue to think it an unwise decision, and we venture the prediction that the day will come when our people would reverse that decision, if they could. If two per cent payment by the Roads on the amount of the Government's lien was insufficient, how much better off will our shippers be when the Roads are sold to the highest bidder? No syndicate would put money into such an enterprise with the expectation of earning less than four per cent per annum. That, of course, means that the net earnings must be double what would have sufficed under the proposed funding bill. That is the kernel of this much misrepresented railroad question. So long as arithmetic has any value, four will remain twice as much as two, and the doubling of the interest on the Pacific Railroads' debt will mean the collection of a great many more millions a year from our people. What there is in that to grow wildly enthusiastic over no sane man can tell. That the railroad has necessarily made enemies, and has been fought, not because of the injustice of its cause, but because of the malice and hatred it has he gotten, goes without saying. It is a fatal trick we have in California to hate every man and institution that succeeds. We never, for instance, permit one of ourselves to rise to importance in national politics, or to become a cabinet minister. If, perchance, a President-elect intimates that he would like to draw one of his official family from the Pacific Coast, we at once start in to destroy every man of mark, and invariably finish up by recommending a colorless man, who will never amount to much. We are too jealous one of another to re-elect our congressmen often enough for them to learn the ropes, and become useful to their constituents and to the country. We are so equally divided politically that we cut the singular figure of choosing electors favorable to both Presidential candidates. As a rule, when the rest of the country goes Republican we are Democratic and when the Democrats are on top and something is to be gained from them, we usually have some weakling congressmen in Washington making puny attacks upon the powers that be, and rendering everything Californian obnoxious. If we did not like the proposed funding bill, it would have been the part of wisdom to have gone into consultation with railroad officials to find out what could have been done, and, in the last resort, to have delivered them an ultimatum.

Reason should always hold sway when large material interests are involved. We see how that is in the case of millionaire stockholders who have much to lose. They may say hard things of the other fellow, and hate him like poison, but they take care to "get together" in the end and combine for mutual protection. Whoever else loses they win, and so go on from one triumph to another. There was every reason why the people of California and the railroad men should have come together. It was to the interest of this Coast that the best possible terms should have been made, always, provided, that the railroad gave guarantees that its customers should adequately share in the easy terms obtained. That could all have been arranged by consultation and agreement and a way could have been found to render it binding. Every dollar, in either interest or principal, that Congress consented to throw off the original debt, would have been in the nature of a dollar subsidy granted to the traffic of this Coast. The disposition of the rest of the country was highly favorable to helping this section in that way. A just and liberal view was held of the subject matter. It was felt that the men who built the Pacific railroads in the first place, and the men who are building up a commonwealth on these shores, were worthy not only of just, but even of generous treatment. It was not forgotten that the bonds upon which dollar for dollar, with interest at the rate of six per cent is now demanded, were sold originally for no more than sixty cents on the dollar. It was also remembered that the prices of rails and other material were two or three times greater than now. The road was undertaken as a national necessity. It has accomplished all and more than was expected of it. It has brought all parts of the country together, led the Indian difficulty to a peaceful end, rendered California and its wonders accessible to the world, and has in one way and another saved the Government more money than the amount of the bonds it guaranteed. With these and other like considerations in view, there was every disposition in the East to have forgiven the entire debt, if only California had desired it. But our people were not that way minded. Led by persons actuated by hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness, they preferred revenge, even if railroad chaos should result. To foreclose is easier said than done. If accomplished, the Government will have a white elephant on its hands. The end is not yet.

The Examiner and One can readily understand why the Grove L. Johnson. Examiner saw fit to mutilate and suppress the speech of Grove L. Johnson at Washington, wherein that gentleman treated the youthful Mr. Hearst to as excoriating and just a roast as it has ever been the fortune of a man to receive. Had some demagogue, purchased, perhaps not by gold, but by the plaudits of a number of illiterate and principle-ignoring Californians, been speaking, and had he seen fit to throw bouquets at that paragon of moneyed journalists, then we should have been treated to the speech in full, with a few extra remarks thrown in by some pandering editorial writer. As it was, Mr. Hearst was shown up in his true colors and as every intelligent Californian sees him. Mr. Johnson properly decided to explain to the nation's representatives and Easterners in general, that men of the Hearst and Sutro type are not good specimens of Western civilization, but that they are merely the well-clothed leaders of a minority, whose chief claim to consideration lies in its very offensiveness. Time was when the ravings of Mr. Sutro and the virtuous indignation of Mr. Hearst were not without effect. Demagogues and dogs must have their day, and always attract attention until disposed of. The fall of these two gentlemen came when people asked themselves: "What has either of them given us as compared to the railroad they both decry?" The one, a Hebrew adventurer, gave the mining world a tunnel, in exchange, however, for millions, and the deal will cause the righteous abuse of the purchasers to follow his gold-greedy ghost even into Gehenna; the other, a sprig of our own soap-sud aristocracy, has given us a newspaper whose apparent mission has been, and is, to blast every legitimate California industry, to picture us as a race of male and female desperadoes, as foes to virtue, to decency, and to right, and to damn us generally in the eyes of the world. Congressman Johnson is entitled to the thanks of all true Californians for the service he has rendered us in turning the searchlight of investigation upon these two men, and in holding them up to public scorn. That the Examiner refused to print his speech was not to be wondered at. It is as much the enemy to truth as it is to this fair State of California.

Progress Of The The National Civil Service Reform League has just held its annual session in Philadelphia. Most remarkable progress was shown in the reports and addresses. The first movement toward reform was made during Grant's second term. It failed because the spoilsmen were too strong. During the administration following it was introduced into the Interior Department at Washington, and in the Custom House and Post Office at New York. From that time the growth has been rapid, although it has faced the continual opposition of professional politics. The present law was passed in 1882. At the close of 1884, there were less than 15,000 government employees in the classified service. At the present time there are nearly 90,000. New York and Massachusetts have adopted the system in State government, and Pennsylvania is expected to pass a law for the same purpose at the present session of her Legislature. The City of Chicago introduced the merit system by a majority of 50,000 votes, indicating its popularity with the people. The plan has either been already adopted, or movements are under way looking to that end in the cities of New Orleans, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Denver, Seattle, Tacoma, Galveston, St. Louis and Wheeling, W. Va.

Notwithstanding this firm hold the efforts of the spoilsmen against it are still desperate, and what is worse their methods are insidious. Unable as they are to fight the reform openly, their efforts are directed toward obtaining, by specious arguments, from the Civil Service Commission, the adoption of such rules and amendments as tend to destroy the real intent of the law. Strange to say, an association has been formed in New York with this avowed purpose. Strenuous efforts are being made by them to transfer the management of civil service examinations from the Commission to heads of departments, the effect of which would be to destroy the merit system in any department controlled by a spoilsman. They demand that heads of departments shall have the right to approve or amend questions. This is equally insidious. If a spoilsman with appointments to make, knows the questions, his beelers will know them also and their answers too. They require the right to make appointments from the whole list of eligibles instead of from the highest three in grade, as at present. As the minimum of the grades on the eligible list is seventy per cent, a compliance with this proposal would sacrifice the purpose of the law to award appointments to merit as shown in competitive examination. These demands should clearly not be granted and the National League will do good work if they compass their prompt denial. There are already rules adopted which are unjust to merit and serve as entering wedges for the spoilsmen. To illustrate: the people will be best served if the most meritorious eligible has the widest chance of appointment to the public service. An applicant, we will suppose, entered the examinations in April 1896, for a certain grade in the Customs service. He has gained the highest percentage in the list of eligibles. Now the law does not permit his appointment to the service except in the grade for which he applies, and yet after his position on the list was obtained, the Commission promulgated a new rule that "any employee may be promoted or transferred to the lowest class in any other grade, upon passing a non-competitive examination." That is to say, the eligible with a standing of 98 per cent, may be shouldered to one side, to clear the way of a favorite who gains seventy per cent in a non-competitive examination. He spends time and money to gain his place on the list on the faith of the law that it would be of value. What right has the Commission to destroy that compact by a retroactive rule? It is clearly an injustice to him, detrimental to the public service, valuable only to the politician and his protege, and should be rescinded before the breach made is widened by the spoilsmen.

Canadian Independence and Annexation.

The question of the future of Canada shows signs of becoming a very interesting one in the near future, not only for the Dominion, but for the United States. Two parties are rapidly forming in Canada—one favoring an imperial federation with the mother country and her colonies; the other urging a closer union with the United States—a sentiment which is sure to develop into a desire for annexation. The reasons for the present unrest are plain. Manitoba is notoriously displeased with her associates. To begin with, she is situated deplorably. Cut off from both ends of the Dominion by immense tracts of desolate and practically uninhabitable areas; overridden by Imperialism and Railwayism, and coerced from Ottawa, it is not surprising that her eyes turn longingly to the South. Ontario and Quebec are little better off. The proposed federation would be sure to cast upon them a largely increased burden for military and naval purposes, while it would deprive them in a large measure of the independence they now have. In the meantime, they see the most energetic portion of their population permanently removing to the United States in steadily increasing numbers. To sacrifice themselves to the interests of England and Australia would not in any way better their condition. But what of the United States? The very reasons which are increasing the popularity of annexation in Canada, joined with others, are the very reasons which would make Canada an undesirable acquisition for us. The Dominion cannot offer us a quid pro quo. There are extensive wheat lands in her middle West, but it is noticeable that they are not attracting a large population, and we have already more of such land than we can sow with profit. There are, undoubtedly, rich mines in British Columbia, but they are bound to be of temporary value. Annexation would throw upon the United States the burden of Canadian debt, without bringing an equivalent in assets. It would compel us to protect an immensely increased and unusually exposed Coast line on two oceans. It would add to our present difficulties with transcontinental railways. It would add to our citizenship a large class whose aims, objects, ambitions, and modes of thought are wholly antagonistic to the spirit of our Institutions—a people as difficult for us to assimilate as would be the Spanish races of the West Indies or the Kanakas of the Pacific. Were the increased land area desirable, the Canadians would not exhibit so much willingness to leave it. We could purchase the most of it now for one-half the money they have put into it. If it is of so little value to them, why, then, should we covet it? It would add nothing to our greatness and much to our burdens. We have land enough, debts enough, and troubles enough, and neither of the four cardinal points can offer us an adequate reason for extending our domain.

Improving The Electoral Franchise.

It is one of the most promising signs in American politics that our people, whenever and wherever appealed to, have shown more than willingness to improve the conditions upon which the electoral franchise is exercised. Two years ago the people of California carried a constitutional amendment, by a large majority, empowering the Legislature to impose an educational qualification as a pre-requisite to voting. At the election in November last two States submitted constitutional amendments to popular vote, rendering the exercise of the suffrage more difficult to foreign immigrants. Hitherto Texas has allowed all comers to vote who have resided in the State one year, provided that on the day of election, or before, they declared an intention to become citizens. The last Legislature submitted a proposition that such a declaration must be made not less than six months before the election, and it carried by an almost unanimous vote. Minnesota has permitted foreigners to vote upon a simple declaration of intention, but an amendment was carried at the late election requiring full citizenship; which of course, means a residence of five years. That such a proposal should have succeeded in Minnesota is remarkable, because six-tenths of the population of that State are of foreign birth. Last, but not least, Congress has imposed an educational qualification as a necessity to all immigrants who would land on our shores. That measure has been generally acquiesced in and approved. These signs of a conservative trend in the popular mind, will give no little satisfaction to thoughtful men everywhere. To be sure, these amendments fall very far short of what is needed, but they are to be welcomed as indicating progress in the right direction.

Republican Simplicity.

Times have changed since a newly-elected President of the United States rode down to the Capitol alone, hitched his horse to a post, was sworn in, returned as he came, and thus ended the inaugural ceremony. All accounts from Washington indicate that President-elect McKinley is to be inaugurated with a degree of pomp and splendor that will put in the shade all previous occasions of like nature. The Springfield Republican is the respectable authority for the statement that "prices for windows on Pennsylvania avenue, on inauguration day, are rising rapidly. Latest quotations: single windows, $75 to $100; single rooms, with two or three windows, $300; suite with eight windows, $1,000 to $5,000." These prices will be paid for the privilege of seeing Grover Cleveland and William McKinley ride in the same carriage, and witnessing the longest parade ever known at an inauguration at the capital city. On the way to the Capitol the Ohio man will sit on the left, but, when the return trip is made, the New Yorker will take that seat. All this pageantry would look better if it were the spontaneous outcome of enthusiasm on the part of the people. Mark Hanna is engineering it all, and using the surplus "fat" fried out of the protected industries. Evidently no money is to be spared to give McKinley a prodigious "send off." We think he will live long enough to regret it.

Concerning Immigration. The Lodge-Corliss Bill, which will shortly come before the United States Senate, aims not so much at the exclusion of foreigners generally, but of those who are ignorant alike of their own language, of an occupation, and of the standards of living and character which distinguish the American people. This is a measure which will meet with the hearty approval of every man interested in the welfare of this country, and its desirability will undoubtedly be recognized by those to whom it goes for ultimate recognition. The passage of this Bill will restrict, in a large measure, the immigration of that most undesirable and illiterate element, consisting of the Slav, Latin, and Asiatic races. To class along with these immigrants those coming from the United Kingdom, France, Germany, and Scandinavia, is as unjust as it is foolish. During the last fiscal year the average illiteracy of emigrants from Austria, Hungary, Italy, Poland, and Russia was 40.1 per cent, while of those coming from the other mentioned countries it was only 3.7 per cent. Statistics also show that, while the former seldom become naturalized, the latter hasten to take out their papers and develop into good and patriotic citizens. By the census of 1890, of the Slav, Latin, and Asiatic foreign born in the United States, 32.0 per cent. were aliens, while of the British, German, and Scandinavian only 9.9 per cent. were aliens. The immigration of this undesirable element has been steadily increasing during the last six years, and it is time a halt was called. Of pauper labor we have already more than enough. By permitting the ranks of the dissatisfied to swell, property and law-abiding citizens are endangered, and the welfare of the Republic is undermined. Of frugal, intelligent, and capable immigrants we cannot have too many. In time they become employers of labor themselves, and thus help to rid the human market of some of its excess stock. They soon recognize how much better off they are in this country than under the Governments to which they formerly owed allegiance, and they gradually become good Americans in every sense of the word. The others, on the other hand, associate only with their fellows, and remain strangers to our ways and institutions. In their own countries they are of use merely as food for shot and shell. Seeing that we have no such use for them, we had better refuse them admittance within our peaceful gates.

Our Part in Cuba. The Cuban question was beset with difficulties from the start. We had no right to rob a country with which we had treaties of friendship, unity and commerce of the gem of her possessions. At the same time, we had selfish interests to promote in aiding whichever side could best govern Cuba. If the Spanish government could repress the rebellion, establish order, and put commerce on a satisfactory footing, well and good. We wanted no more. But it is plain to all observers that that is something she has utterly failed to do. The last loan she raised for the purpose of quieting Cuba is nearly all gone, and almost nothing has been accomplished. Spain is practically exhausted, whilst the rebellion still flourishes. In this condition of affairs it may well be believed that there is unusual truth in the press dispatches which say that Spain is ready to accept the mediation of the United States, and to give Cuba independence in everything but name. But President Cleveland, it is to be feared, has undertaken a big contract when he promises to get the consent of the Cuban hot-heads to a settlement that contains the substance of all that they have ever contended for. It may be that he has brought pressure to bear upon them in advance, and knows exactly what they will do. If so, he has prepared a diplomatic coup that will do him honor. The Senate does not like the bloodless victories that the President is winning. Its members want to do the whole business themselves, without possessing a single qualification for the doing of it. They desire to meddle in, and muddle the affairs of all creation. Whilst, however, Cameron, Mills, and the rest of them are igniting fire-brands, the President bids fair to extinguish the whole conflagration. Cuba levying and spending her own taxes, managing her own affairs, and dividing the offices around among her own people, ought to be one of the most happy and prosperous corners of God's earth, but will she be? About that there must remain grave doubt, until the trial is actually made.

Our North Atlantic Squadron. The efforts of our Government to acquire a serviceable navy, which have been progressing for the last decade, are at last bearing some practical fruit. With the exception of a few fire-eaters, we do not want war with Spain. Barring a few enthusiasts, we do not want Cuba. For nearly two years Spain has been so continually irritated by our jingoism that it is quite possible that the possession of a respectable navy has saved our Atlantic seaboard from attack. However that may be, it is with a comfortable feeling that Uncle Sam sits on the rocky brow that overlooks his "sea-born Salamis," and counts his ships at break of day. He sees before him his North Atlantic Squadron, now grown to the proportions of a fleet. It includes two battleships of the first class—the Massachusetts and Indiana—supposed to be unexcelled as fighting machines; two second-class battleships—the Maine and Texas—both possessing the confidence of the Navy Department, at least. Of powerful modern monitors, with the heaviest of armament, there are the Puritan, Miantonomoh, and Amphitrite. The armored cruisers New York, Brooklyn, and the swift Columbia complete the heavy ships of the line, while the supplemental fleet includes the cruisers Montgomery and Raleigh, the ram Katahdin, the dynamite vessel Vesuvius, and the torpedo boats Cushing and Ericsson, not to mention several cruisers which could quickly be called home from foreign waters. Weak as we are in torpedo boats, the above presents a fleet powerful enough to guard our coasts against any power of the Spanish class, and to take the aggressive in the West Indies if the necessity arises. "He is thrice armed who hath his quarrel just," but it is pleasant to know that we have the means to sustain a just quarrel, if it should arise out of the present complications.

The Propagation Of Criminals. New York City has been exercised for many months over the trial and retrial of Maria Barberi, for the murder of her lover, Dominico Cataldo, in April 1895. Society ladies have wasted tons of sentiment and hot-house flowers on this accused woman. On the 10th of December the farce was completed by a verdict of acquittal, the defense being psychical epilepsy and consequent irresponsibility for crime. She may now, we presume, make continued crime her legalized profession. Not the least interesting development of the trial is the fact that the mother of the murderess went on the stand for the defense and testified that she had borne thirteen children including the playful Maria, and that every one of the baker's dozen was weak minded and epileptic. The question now arises: What will it cost the country to take care of Mother Barberi's brood of criminals and incompetents during the coming years, provided each one makes as good a record as Maria? Here is a practical test for Prof. Lombroso, and those who think with him that the naturally vicious should not be permitted to propagate criminals and idiots at the expense of the public, and transmit to posterity the increasing evils of their weaknesses.

The Purification of the Press. The Society of Friends lately held its annual meeting in Baltimore, and has issued an appeal to the editors and journalists of the country, requesting them to give less prominence to crime and scandal in the columns at their disposal, and otherwise to labor in the interests of pure journalism. This appeal could well be heeded by many papers on the Pacific Coast, where journalism is, in many cases, the most degraded of the professions. More prominence should be given to virtue and good deeds, even if the illiterate and unwashed prefer sensationalism and scandal. It is apparently forgotten that there are respectable and God-fearing people in California, and that they must be supplied with the news. The average newspaper is run for the edification of the saloon keeper and his patrons, and other people must suffer accordingly. The so-called "Sunday paper" is of itself a desecration of the holy Sabbath, and does more harm with its subtle impurity than all the yellow-covered novels in existence. It is refreshing to know that there is at least one daily paper in this city the columns of which are clean, and which does not take contamination into the home. This journal is the Call, and it would be good for this State if there were more like it.

HON. GEORGE C. PERKINS.

THE Republican Party has once more sent to the United States Senate George C. Perkins, a gentleman of pronounced ability and patriotism. That he would be elected at Sacramento to succeed himself became an assured thing when Mr. Samuel Shortridge decided to retire from the fight, and thus help along his opponent to victory. In connection with the fight so lately settled, and which was waged with all the ardor usual to political campaigns, great praise is due to the re-elected Senator for the clean and dignified fight his managers, acting under his instructions, made for him. It was a hard battle, and victory was honorably contended for on all sides. We feel sure that Mr. Perkins knew nothing about the disgusting methods indulged in by the abusive Examiner to prejudice popular opinion against Mr. Shortridge. No gentleman, or anyone with the first instincts of a gentleman, could condone that journalistic blackguardism, neither would he wish to defeat an adversary by such aid. Mr. Perkins himself comes out of the fight with clean hands, but it has been made painfully apparent that we have in California, for a leading Democratic journal, a foul-tongued and evil-mind shrew, whose only mission it is to attempt to soil with vituperative mud the characters of enterprising and able men, who may not be willing to fill its dirty coffers.

There is much for Senator Perkins to accomplish at Washington. Eastern prejudice against the West must be overcome, and our possibilities and resources legitimately advertised. This Senator Perkins is pre-eminently capable of doing, and we can safely leave the matter in his hands. But there is another task for the Senator to perform, and a hard one. This task demands herculean strength, and is nothing less than counteracting the evil and dignified fight his managers, acting under his instructions, made for him. It was a hard battle, and victory was honorably contended for on all sides. We feel sure that Mr. Perkins knew nothing about the disgusting methods indulged in by the abusive Examiner to prejudice popular opinion against Mr. Shortridge. No gentleman, or anyone with the first instincts of a gentleman, could condone that journalistic blackguardism, neither would he wish to defeat an adversary by such aid. Mr. Perkins himself comes out of the fight with clean hands, but it has been made painfully apparent that we have in California, for a leading Democratic journal, a foul-tongued and evil-influence of Mr. Hearst's San Francisco newspaper—the Examiner. The organ of demagogues and desperadoes, its columns open to the harlot and the quack, its till as hungry for the nickel of the beggar as it is for the dollars wrenched from the wealthy, the paper is an eyesore to the community and a disgrace and a danger to the State. It remains for Senator Perkins to continue the good work commenced by Grove L. Johnson, and place Mr. Hearst in his proper relation to California. When this position is adequately explained, Easterners will be willing to invest their money here. There is great work ahead for the Senator, and we trust he will not shirk it.

"We obey no wand but pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

THERE is danger for the public lurking in these long, dull, theatrical weeks. It is at such times the critic's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of play-making. Not that I am menacing dramatic literature with anything of my own, having, as yet, too much disesteem for my enemies. Besides, I should dislike my young, hopeful life tinged by the bitterness of inglorious authorship, or handicapped by the misfortune of premature success.

But there are other busy pens who have no such nice ideas about maintaining the balance of the critical temperament. Mr. Frawley told me there were but two critics in the whole town who had not offered him from one to three plays for production by his company. I don't know who the other fellow is, but I'd like to know—we seem to be disengaged on the same fishing days.

Of course, this practice of writing plays is not confined to critics alone. There are others. After Greer Harrison's experience with Runnymede, the laic dramatist dramatized unseen for a space. Then Leo Cooper's students in the actorial art cautiously began giving performances of one and two-act "original plays," and the fever burned again. Every third person I met was either writing a play or had one finished, and wanted an opinion (favorable, you may be sure) until I wondered where I could find a plain, pleasure-seeking theatre-goer, who had not turned his recreation into a trade.

In justice to Mr. Cooper, I must confess that I have never been present at one of his students' matinees, and I am willing to take his word for it that the comedies, farces, and tragedies he and his disciples present are valuable additions to the drama; but, in the gentleness of my nature, I have been induced to read many manuscript plays, and each time it has been to either lose a friend or make an enemy.

I opened my heart to Mr. Bouvier the other night. I asked him if he had ever struck upon a successful way of staging off the embryo dramatist.

"Easiest thing in the world," said Bouvier, falling into a now-watch-me pose. "Now, say you're the man with a play, and I'm myself, the manager. You walk up briskly, manner courteous, smile bland, and all that sort of thing.

You say: 'Mr. Bouvier, I believe.'

I nod.

"My friend Mr. Friedlander," you continue, 'advised me to call on you. I have a play, The Homebreaker; it's in five acts. Mr. Friedlander says it's almost too ambitious for his theatre, and he recommends my reading it to you. There's one thing I can tell you right now—it's absolutely original and—

"Here I stop you with a gentle gesture. 'My dear sir,' I say, 'while I may to you appear selfish and unreasonable, and unappreciative of the honor you do me, I cannot read your play. I myself have recently finished a play, a society drama I should say, in four acts, The Wife-napper, and all the little influence I may have must be exerted to my own advantage. I appreciate the compliment from you, and I am grateful for Mr. Friedlander's kindness, but the theatrical business isn't what it used to be, and, to tell you the truth, I don't know where I'll land if this play of mine doesn't go on and pull me out of the hole.'

"Say? Why, what can he say? He walks away, wondering what the stage is coming to when base, commercial influence is pitted against real brains and literature. And," finishes Mr. Bouvier, balancing easily on his heels, "there you are."

which has been such good-paying, gilt-edged real estate for Joseph. That and the horseshoes have made him millions; he can afford to be sick if he wants to, and to have a private press-agent bard of his own to sing the song of Murpby. And in view of this, there is something genuine and generous in the fact of his being on the stage at all, and I believe he only acts out of brotherly love and patriotism—just to keep the dear, old, boggy isle green in the hearts of his countrymen. And they meet him a good half way with whole-armed, vivifying applause, as he bounds boyishly over the Columbia stage in the pink and mettle of his sixty sunny summers. Who can criticize him? and who wants to? and who would read the criticism if any one could be found to write it? Joseph Murpby is to be regarded as a dilettante, not a professional, and by the time I am sixty and he a hundred and twenty, he will have smoothed out the Kerry Gow and Shawn Rhue to suit the generation. Meantime, here's to Joseph Murpby—and when he's ill a-bed, here's to brother John, who, to be punctual, has ten years the start of him.

Nine Hungarian rhapsodists, who style themselves The Royal Hungarian Court Orchestra, and a Swedish ventriloquist with an almost unlimited repertory of dexterously handled figures, and who is named on the programme Lieut. Noble, are the reinforcements at the Orpheum. The Hungarian band is composed of soloists, and, while their ensemble is free, dashing, and impetuous, after the manner of Hungarians, I daresay the Orpheumites will shower most of their enthusiasm upon the solos. Collectively, the visitors will have a hard time displacing the popularity of Rosner's little hybrid band; but if the virtuosity of the other eight is to be estimated by that of their leader, Matus—whom I heard play the clarinet Monday night with surpassing fluency and delightful tonal integrity, and several other degrees of long-haired, adjectivous excellence which are not exactly in order for an Orpheum notice—you will miss some animate music by staying away.

Nordica, glorified by the recent success of Beyreuth, is now at her best—that is, the best this generation will know. No other American singer has ever achieved anything like the glories that illumine her progress to world-wide fame. And even of the singers foreign born and foreign trained, none has shown gifts and attainments such as hers. Pen can only hope to celebrate her talents and graces; for analysis is well nigh futile, and criticism almost impertinent.

I did not write the foregoing myself, much as I worship at this American songstress's shrine and much as I sympathize with the futility of analysis and the impertinence of criticism. It is a stanza from the advance courier's authoritative pen, and it foretells the coming of Nordica and her comrades to the Baldwin Tuesday night, where you, and I, and all pretenders to art and fashion will receive her as befits a queen of song. Dear old Scalchi is of the party, with lots of rich 'celloness, I understand, left in her great, wide, warm voice. Barron Bertald, tenor, and John C. Dempsey, basso cantate, complete the quartette, which, augmented by Luckstone, the pianist, and an orchestra, will sing in the three concerts, announced for Tuesday and Thursday nights, and Saturday afternoon. The first part of each programme is given up to miscellaneous songs, arias, and concerted numbers, to be concluded with an act, or scene, from opera. Faust, Tuesday; Trovatore, Thursday; and Siegfried at the Saturday matinee.

Altogether a hopeful-looking week is looming up, with the additional prospect of some real plays and famous acting when a week later Modjeska opens her season.

The Columbia's bid for patronage is Charles H. Yale's time-defier, The Devil's Auction, in which are promised the acme of scenic splendor, a lively bicycle satire, a seductive ballet, bevels of beautiful girls, regiments of trained comedians, aerial artists on the skylight ladder, dialect specialists, quips and songs beyond number, and a sourette whose banjo playing is unequalled.

Besides a new sailor's frolic by the ballet, the Orpheum announces three new attractions: Binns & Binns (immensely clever musical burlesquers, who were here a season or two ago), the Frantz family of acrobats, and Wilson and Waring, comedians.

Jack and the Beanstalk will run another week, and then be shelved among the available assets of the Tivoli.

A communication from undaunted Mr. Greenbaum asks me to state that the San Francisco Symphony Society has been brilliantly organized with a guarantee fund of several thousand dollars. Mr. Phil Lillenthal has been elected treasurer; Mr. Hinrichs will be conductor, and Mr. Beel concert-master; and the orchestra will number fifty-five instruments. All that is needed is an appreciative public to swell the subscription lists—which are wide open at the music stores—go to the concerts, and look cultured. The season will be given at the Columbia on alternate Thursday afternoons, beginning February 4th.

Hugo Herold, the son of San Francisco's musical Patriarch, will give a song recital at Golden Gate Hall on the evening of the 29th inst.

That's all.

ASHTON STEVENS.

THE DANCE OF THE DEAD—FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE.

THE sexton looked forth at the mid hour of night,
O'er the tombs where the dead were reclining;
The moon, at its full, gave a great, ghostly light,
And the churchyard as day was shining.
First one, then another—oh, terrible sight!—
Each grave opened wide, and, in gowns long and white,
The dead all arose from their sleeping,
Round the tombs grimly dancing and leaping.

In a skeleton ring, then, together they hung,
While they danced as the waves of the ocean—
The poor and the rich, the old and the young—
But their grave-clothes hindered their motion;
And, as here no modesty held its broad sway,
They all shook them off, and around them there lay
Their winding sheets, here and there scattered,
And they naked—but that little mattered.

In a frenzy of joy then they swung their long shanks,
Their long fingers in unison snapping,
And they clicked and clacked as they played their wild pranks,
As though timber on timber were clapping.
Then the sexton laughed loudly again and again,
And mischief gave slyly the thought to his brain;
"Now quickly—'tis joking, not thieving—Steal a winding sheet! None are perceiving."

It was done; and then swiftly he fled in affright
Behind the great door of the tower,
While the dance still continued, the moonbeams bright
O'er the weird scene still holding their power.
At last it was o'er, and the skeleton crowd,
One after another, each slipped, on its shroud,
Then into their cold graves they glided,
And silence once more presided.

But one—'tis the last—trips and stumbles along,
And eager each to hasten it scratches;
But none of its comrades have done it this wrong,
For the scent in the air now it catches.
The church gate it rattled, but backward was pressed;
To the joy of the sexton, the door had been blessed—
With crosses of iron 'twas covered,
And angels' wings over it hovered.

Its shroud it must have, else it rests not again,
For soon its last hour will be chiming;
The columns it grasps the high tower to attain
From summit to summit still climbing.
Oh, sad for the sexton, for swifter it glides,
And onward it rushes in wonderful strides!
O mischief! 'tis thou hast undone him;
Heaven held him! 'tis almost upon him.

The sexton grew pale, in his horror he shook,
And the shroud would have yielded with gladness;
Near, nearer it came, then its last leap it took
In a frenzy of rage and of madness.
For an instant the moon no longer shone;
"One!" thundered the clock in a terrible tone;
Its limbs through the air wildly dashing,
Down—down—fell the skeleton, crashing!

The Looker-On

NEW YORK sweldom is now gossiping about that dinner at Sherry's and the modest young lady who burst into tears when asked to dance in the "altogether." Yet there was a hachelor dinner party given in this city some time ago, where there was no squeamishness, but where the attempt at art was made the apology for the nakedness of the surroundings. A certain wealthy young gentleman was going to Europe, and determined, like Lord Bateman, before he went abroad strange countries for to see, to give his friends a farewell dinner which should teach them not to forget him. He applied to a friend of his who was presumed to be a man of invention and originality, to devise this hanquet.

"I want something startling," he said; "something out of the common. I don't mean as far as the eating and drinking goes, because all novelty in that line is exhausted. But something startling, old fellow, and never mind the expense. I'll foot the bills and consider myself your debtor for life."

So the mentor set his wits a-working to please this young Telemachus, and announced one day that the plan was ready, and pocketed a check of three figures to arrange with the talent. The dinner was an exquisite affair, given at a place where all that sort of thing is doue up to the handle. When the desert was set upon the table, the lights were lowered, and a strain of weird, Oriental music was played by a few musicians, invisible to the guests. Presently the portieres at one end of the dining room were softly withdrawn, and a young girl, attired in the costume of a Roman cup-bearer, entered, stepping slowly, and swinging a censer filled with burning herbs of pungent but most agreeable perfume. She chanted a sort of hymn as she moved, and incensed each guest, and after making the circuit of the room, retired, while the revelers applauded loudly. Now the music became more animated, and again the portieres were withdrawn, and again the lovely censer-bearer appeared, this time leading a procession composed of six very handsome young women, who bore a huge shell, or imitation of a sea shell, upon their gleaming shoulders, and who represented the nymphs of Venus Aphrodite, carrying the Queen of Beauty to the hanquet. Three were dark, and three blonde, and wore sea-green gauzy robes, while their feet were perfectly bare. The guests arose and made way for them, while they placed the shell in the center of the table, and then danced about it chanting a song in praise of love in excellent time and rythm. When the song was concluded, they took from a basket carried by a plump, tiny Cupid, wreaths of flowers, with which they crowned the guests. All the literary part had been written by the mentor for the feast, and contained appropriate sentiments. Then at a signal from the host, the lid of the shell was opened, and Venus herself, the most beautiful of all, slowly arose from her casing, and the picture was so intensely picturesque, and so artistic, that the utter lack of the garments of conventionality was forgotten, and the enthusiasm of the guests was unbounded. Venus sang an adieu to the host, and with her nymphs pledged him in wine from goblets made after the pattern of the antique, while Cupid, holding her doves, crouched at her side. What might otherwise be deemed a rather risque spectacle, because of its artistic presenting, had not a single element of coarseness. But it would not do to give a censorious and mock modest world too close an insight into the doings of the epicureans.

Mr. James M. Hamilton went to a private masquerade a few days ago attired as Mephistopheles, a character which he is pleased to assume upon those festive occasions. All through that revel did Mr. Hamilton, "the Actors' Friend," behave himself most agreeably as the devil, and the reproachful rattle of the milk-cart was heard on the stony street when he emerged from his hack and rang the bell of the family mansion on California street. The pious domestic who attends to one part of the ménage was completing a long letter to a brother in Ireland, while the crimson figure on the steps was alternately wrestling with the latch key and the door hell. She looked out of the window, and the spectacle of the great enemy of mankind boldly claiming admission (for Nora knew nothing of the masquerade) completely paralyzed the good creature. "Mother of Mercy, intercede for me!" she screamed, as she emptied a can of holy water on the gay masquerader beneath, and put her hands to her ears to shut out the hissing sound she felt must follow. Well, Mr. Hamilton finally got in. But the next time he goes to a masquerade he will afford Nora a private rehearsal before he departs.

This seems to be a winter of cluh discontent. The Cosmos is in a sad muddle, and the Pacific-Union differences are far from reconciliation. The oldsters do not want to give up their snug quarters on Union Square for a gaudy palace on Van Ness avenue. They like to slip away to lunch, and a quiet rubber afterwards, and still be within five or eight minutes' run of busness headquarters. The youngsters want a place where they can entertain their sisters, cousins, sweethearts, wives, and aunts, and witch them with their noble trenchership. The ladies are all on the side of the young men. And why not? Their supremacy means a letting down of the bars that separate club life from womankind, a season of game dinners, and an annex where they can exchange views after the fatigues of shopping. Now, the matter has virtually taken this shape: The oldsters will dissolve and build a clubhouse for themselves, and restrict the membership to a couple of hundred or less. The Bohemian Club must profit largely by the split, because many Pacific Union men are also members of the Bohemian, and the quarters of the latter, on Post street and Grant avenue, being so accessible, they will make it their habitat and spend their shekels there.

As the son of a clergyman, Horace Platt is to be regarded as an authority upon things heavenly. The witty lawyer tells a story of his encounter with a dirty-faced urchin, whose countenance was in marked contrast to his beautiful raiment. The boy was arrayed in Faunterloy style and his modish costume was unexceptional. His most objectionable feature was his coarse red hair which fell over the shoulders of his velvet coat in its long uncurled length, looking for all the world like the tail of a chestnut horse. His appearance was a striking commentary on misplaced parental admiration, and the tout ensemble jarred on the aesthetic nature of the president of the Art Association. Platt felt particularly disagreeable that day and the smile which usually divides his cheeks was absent. He stopped the boy to deliver himself of some surplus irritation.

"See here," he said severely, "why don't you get your hair cut?"

"Oh," calmly replied the ingenuous youth, aged seven, "Mamma wants me to look like one of them damned cherubims."

Frank Unger sailed for Honolulu last week with Edgar Crimmins, of New York, to make straight the paths in the summer isles for Harry Gillig, Donald deV. Graham, and Aleck Hamilton, who depart to-day for the same sultry clime. Therefore shall there be a gap in Bohemia until the return of the wanderers. Mr. Graham will give three concerts in Honolulu, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Marquardt, Miss Alice Turner, soprano, and Mr. Gillig will also sing on those occasions. Mr. Graham will resume his lessons after February 14th. It is not necessary to say that the visit of those Bohemians will make glad the loyalists who mourn the pomp and circumstance of the fallen court, as well as those of the stern republicans who, under Oliver Cromwell Dole, are sharing the blessings of equality. Not that President Dole is a Puritan. By no means. He can play the cavalier as well as any roisterer that ever wore love locks.

TO judge from the enthusiasm manifested by numbers of pretty women at the football game last Saturday, King, of the Army, kicked himself into high favor. One pretty girl, whose bright sallies always make her a sought-for social figure, remarked that he was "as good at football as in dancing the cotillion." There was a very fashionable crowd present at the game, and feeling ran high for the University chaps on one hand, and the boys in blue on the other, but the soldiers carried the day, thanks to King's superb playing; in fact, as a plunger, he was a brilliant success. The girls risked red noses and braved the icy wind in their eagerness to watch his movements. Wiltsee's tall form towered above the crowd, as he chatted here and there with the different belles. Harry Tevis was accompanied by his pater and brother Hugh. The widower Lieutenant of the army was in great demand; all his favorite girls were there, but, as usual, the stylish blonde had the innings. Duperu was devotion itself to the stately brunette, though rumor says a soon to be young matron is trying her best to win him for her sister. Winnie Jones looked blue about the gills, poor old chap, and General Barnes vied with any man present in attractive appearance. The Hoffman sisters had a bevy of admirers around them. Mrs. O'Neil Reis and Miss Brooks were warmly greeted by their friends, who so seldom see them in town nowadays. Miss Younger was strongly on the side of the 'Varsity boys, as was Miss Ida Gibbons. Greer Harrison was so excited he asked a friend if a ball game would not be a good thing to introduce into his new play.

It must be frankly admitted that the "house party," so striking a feature of British life, is not, as yet, as satisfactory an affair with our Anglophobian settlements of B'lingham and San Mateo. While the friends who assembled at the different homes in that would-be aristocratic vicinity no doubt had a pleasant enough time in a way, yet it is as house parties they were dismally a failure, depending entirely upon the club house gatherings for the festivities, no one house crowd being sufficient in itself to provide recreation without aid from its neighbors. As a bright young woman observed, "it is the same faces everywhere."

One of the most enjoyable affairs yet held at the Hotel Rafael was the festive Twelfth Night gathering, when the guests at that delightful hostelry indulged in the old-time games peculiar to that holiday. Much merriment was caused by the horoscope drawn for several of the men present, and the refreshments served at the wind-up were worthy of mine host Warfield, who is noted for his efficiency in that line.

In the way of future gayeties, 'tis said a leading member of our beau monde is going to introduce the latest Gotham fad, of having her grown-up guests come to a party attired as children—short frocks, pinafores, and knickerbockers. As most of the fashionable folk of the day indulge in childish ways, no doubt the idea will be exceptionally successful in the harmony of the whole.

The return to the swim of Miss Julia Crocker was a feature of the last Friday night cotillion. Miss Crocker was warmly welcomed, and was the recipient of many congratulations upon her recently announced engagement to Sam Buckbee.

On dit the guests at the Hotel Richelieu are meditating giving a dance some time before Lent, which is joyous news for those who indulge in fine suppers.

A Book of A little book, but a good one. Lying land-the jobbers and ingloriously mendacious real estate Week.* dealers have so loudly and so persistently "hoomed" Southern California, describing it as an earthly paradise, free from every ill that flesh is heir to, that it is high time for a sober account, written by intelligent people for intelligent people. Such an account we have here. To the literary person it is, of course, matter of regret that only two of the eight chapters are by Beatrice Harraden, the remaining six, which deal with Southern California from the physician's point of view, being by her medical collaborator, who, though he flings about, as do all medicos, a good many terms, such as "phthisis, tuberculosis, cirrhosis, etc.," yet writes sensibly and gives much useful information. He points out that there are many climates in Southern California, suitable for many different ailments, and that the invalid must exercise much care and judgment in choosing the spot best suited to his particular disease, and the particular stage to which it has advanced. Having chosen his place of residence wisely, the invalid must then live wisely. It is foolish for people who cannot afford in Southern California the comforts and attentions to which they have been accustomed in their own homes, to expect an immediate improvement in their health. It is even probable that the fatigue of reaching the Pacific Slope, and the excitement of new surroundings, will at first cause the invalid to go back somewhat. A reasonable time, as the lawyers say, must be given before the climate can work any distinct benefit. And what is a reasonable time depends on the circumstances of each case. The reader is reminded that Southern California is a pioneer country, and that domestic service is both dear and inefficient, as in all newly-opened lands. The invalid must place his greatest hope of benefit from the climate, in living an almost entirely outdoor life, being careful, however, not to push outdoor exercise to the verge of fatigue and exhaustion. In the first chapter the author of "Ships That Pass in the Night" writes enthusiastically of the beauties and charms of Southern California—of the free, unrestrained, open-air life, the riding and driving, the moonlight excursions, the botanizing expeditions, of the wealth and luxuriance of bright-hued flowers, and the dancing waters of the bright blue Pacific Ocean. In "Out-door Life for Women" Miss Harraden comments on the ease with which, when water is at hand, the desert can be made to blossom as a rose, and tells how a girl from one of the Eastern States started a strawberry ranch, and how another lady cultivated pampas grass, to the strengthening of their health and the filling of their purses. The book will prove very useful to invalids who are contemplating taking up their residence in Southern California, and though it is at times somewhat technical and overladen with statistics of temperature, rainfall, and other matters, it furnishes the reader with many cold facts (such as, for example, that the maximum temperature recorded at Mammoth Tank on the Colorado Desert is 128 degrees Fahrenheit), and plenty of useful suggestions. The little volume is appropriately bound in a cover adorned with a design of cactus and palm.

* "Two Health-Seekers in Southern California," by William A. Edwards, M. D., and Beatrice Harraden. Phila. J. B. Lippincott Company. 1897. Price, $1.

Some time ago, the Chicago Record offered thirty thousand dollars in prizes for "stories of mystery." Out of 816 stories sent in for competition, "Sons and Fathers" won the bad pre-eminence of first place. The worthlessness of contests of this kind for hringing out any real literary talent is pretty conclusively shown by the stories that won the prizes in this competition. "Sons and Fathers" is mysterious enough in all conscience, full of dreams, visions, wild imaginings, and supernatural incidents, told in a banal, commonplace manner, boresome and tedious to the last degree. The tale is a mere tale, with no literary merit whatever. In fact, after struggling painfully, and with many smothered imprecations, through about half of it, we refused to budge an inch further, and, not caring in the least whose son the hero was, we left the mystery unsolved. The general character of the book may be gathered from the titles of a few of the chapters: "Back! Would You Murder Her?" "The Tragedy in the Storm," "In the Crimson Mists of Sunset," "The Shadow Over the Hall," "The Rainbow in the Mist," "The Face of the Body-Snatcher." We are irresistibly reminded of "The Poisoned Gum-Drop; or the Candyman's Revenge."

"Sons and Fathers," by Harry Stillwell Edwards. Published by Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago and New York. 1896.

The Roycroft Printing shop, of East Aurora, N. Y., has issued a well-printed brochure, entitled "Foreign Ideas in the Catholic Church in America," by the Rev. Father George Zurcher, Pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Buffalo, N. Y. From a perusal of its four chapters, we gather that the Catholics of this country are desirous to re-establish the Pope as a temporal sovereign, and that the German Catholics in the United States are aggressive, overbearing, and exacting in their relations with their brethren of other nationalities. We further gather that the German Catholics are much in favor of the removal of restrictions on the sale of lager beer at Church picnics, and are by no means bigoted advocates of water-drinking. These Teutonic churchmen, with the overbearing airs characteristic of the Kaiser's fellow-countrymen, say that "America is no nation, no race, no people": that "We have citizens of a Republic, but no nation, and no national language outside the languages which the races immigrated (sic) speak in their families." Now, while it may be true that the United States is not a nation in the sense in which Great Britain or France is a nation, yet we certainly are of opinion that English is the national language of this country, and that attempts of knots of Poles, Hungarians, Dutchmen or Portuguese, to insist upon the use of these tongues by their American-born children should be suppressed. We may be, and doubtless are, prejudiced in favor of the English language, but we certainly think that any man may be proud to speak the language of Shakespeare and Milton, and that, if he cannot say what he wants to say in it, he had better give up the effort to make himself understood and relapse into silence. "Them's our sentiments."

It gives one a strange feeling to see the title of a book by the late Walter Pater under the head of "Fiction;" but there it is. His "Gaston de Latour," a fragment of a romance, edited by his friend Shadwell, of Oriel College, Oxford, has just been issued by the Macmillan Co. Walter Pater's work has far too much distinction, and presupposes in his readers far too high a degree of culture, for it to be possible that his writings should ever become "popular." But he is a beautiful and finished stylist, and his taste in language, philosophy, and art, being securely founded on the great masters, is unerring. Plato and Shakespeare were his teachers, and his theory of life was that a man should live in close touch with the men and women round him, and endeavor to reach perfection with regard to his own time and place. We say that this was his theory, his practice, so far as we recollect it, perhaps scarcely conformed thereto: but this is to be set down to his fastidious and perhaps hyper-refined temperament.

The Christmas or third issue of a new periodical, "The Sportman's Magazine," presents itself to us in a handsomely illuminated cover. It deals with field sports of all kinds. Some of the articles in the December issue are "Calling for Moose in New Brunswick," "After Big Fish at Santa Catalina," "Hunting Mountain Goat in the Cascades," and "General Custer as a sportsman." The magazine is on much the same lines as Outing. There is a regular department entitled "Photography for Amateurs," in which "the Professor" criticises pictures offered for competition, and particulars are given of liberal prizes offered for the best amateur photographs of subjects of particular classes. In "Current Topics" the Horse Show, the polo and football season, and other matters of interest to sportsmen are found. The subscription price is two dollars a year, one-third less than that of its older rival, Outing. This little bit of arithmetic is commended to The Bookman, with our respects.

For some four years, Mr. Zangwil (whose first, not Christian, name is Israel) contributed to the Pall Mall Magazine a causerie on men and books under the title of "Without Prejudice." In the December issue of that handsome periodical he bids farewell to his readers in a characteristic manner with the words "I have written for you in many places and in many moods, and I cannot hope to have escaped the mood of dullness. But now at last the pen falls from my tired fingers, and I have but the strength to pick it up to bid you farewell—without prejudice." In the January issue of the Pall Mall, Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch, who has recently published a pleasant volume, entitled "Adventures in Criticism," gives us the first of his causeries, under the heading "From a Cornish Window." This issue also contains an article on "Cadet Life at West Point," by Lieutenant Hastings Brown, and one on Warwick Castle by Frances Evelyn Warwick, née Maynard, better known as the Countess of Warwick or Lady Brooke. From a perusal of as much of this article as we could read we infer that her ladyship, though a clever and fascinating woman, has not served any journalistic apprenticeship. If we take away from the article the passages quoted from books, and the titles of pictures transcribed from a catalogue, no editor would give two-and-a-half dollars for what some people, using a bastard English begotten by book-keeping out of ledger, call "the balance."

The California State Mining Bureau has issued its thirteenth Report of the State Mineralogist for the two years ending September 15, 1896. It contains upwards of 700 closely-printed pages, and is illustrated with many fine reproductions of photographic views of mines and mining machinery. The State is taken, County by County, and full details are given of all the mines of any importance in operation. We are requested to mention the fact that any citizen of the State may obtain a copy of this exhaustive report by sending his name and address (accompanied by the stamps for postage on the book) to the California State Mining Bureau, No. 24 Fourth street, San Francisco.

THE poet has said: "There is no place like home," and to make a place worthy the name of home is one of the grandest achievements of men. We know of but one man who, by unceasing watchfulness, courtesy, and care, tact, talent, and indomitable energy, has succeeded in making an ideal home, not only for residents, but for weary travelers from all parts of the civilized world, and that man is Major William B. Hooper, manager of the Occidental Hotel of this city.

That celebrated divine, John P. Newman, Bishop of California, one of its inmates, and who has been a guest in the largest and best hotels in every land, says: "The Occidental stands unrivaled not only for its epicurean table, but for those home comforts and enjoyments with which the Major makes all his guests feel that they have really found a home."

Mining Stocks in Dull Request.

The sun does not shine to the contentment of the Pine street operator. The aspect in and out of the Board rooms is still wintry enough to chill the most sanguine depositor among the speculative element. During the week, a light advance at the south-end group suggested the hope that better times had dawned, but, as usual, hope was nipped in the bud. The rise in values gave the "hear" clique an opportunity to dump stock on the manipulators of the shares, and this soon stamped the life out of the game again. There is a hungry lot on the street just now, and the chance for a five cent deal causes a rush only equaled by that of a ravenous shark on its prey. There is no such thing as nursing the market into shape, with such a crew around, unless at the expenditure of a large sum of money, which would only be warranted on the part of manipulators by a really good ore development. Even then it would be a case of standing off the parasitic element at first, and working it gradually into a corner where it could be choked to death in time. There is a chance for an improvement of importance at the Gold Hill end, where a drive is being made for the west county in very promising ground. A find of ore there would change the complexion of affairs on the street and help out a number of deserving people now helplessly at the mercy of a piratical horde, equal to any little mean and contemptible trickery which the small, miserable soul can devise. The Con.-Cal.-Virginia, Crown Point, and Hale & Norcross assessments were delinquent this week.

The Griffith Consolidated Mine, a promising piece of property on the Mother Lode, located near Diamond Springs, El Dorado County, was bought by Mr. P. George Gow, of the Jumper Mine, during the week. The shaft of this property is only down, as yet, some 140 feet on a vein of fair grade ore from two to three feet wide, on which considerable drifting has been done. The improvements are small, but, as the ore reserves are large, it is the intention of Mr. Gow to duplicate the plant on a much larger scale. The price paid is in the neighborhood of $200,000. The bona fide intentions of the purchasers of this ground, and their previous investments in the Jumper and New Era Mines, of Tuolumne County, is evident from their selections being all young prospects. They are not looking for old shells with a reputation, useful for extracting money from the pockets of over-credulous investors in Great Britain. It is noteworthy that the schemers now foraging all over the State as purveyors for the London market, want something of the kind with a history, owned by people lax enough in principle to permit loading up prices with commissions to any point the rascally promoters may desire. These people have no use for the legitimate propositions favored by such investors as the Glasgow owners of the Jumper and Griffiths.

While the press of Virginia City seems in earnest in its efforts to enthrone people there and elsewhere into taking up the project of re-opening the mines in and around American Flat, it will be hoped that they will succeed in their purpose. The merits of the scheme have been well aired now, and the next step should be organization to put the proposed plans into execution. Talk will not suffice to develop a heavy enterprise of this character. Money is the main desideratum, and plenty of it at that. There are many who believe that these mines are worth the venture, and it is very probable that with the right men at the head of the movement, all the financial aid required would be forthcoming in short order. The San Francisco Stock Exchange has so far never even noticed the matter, but then this is in keeping with its vastly progressive ideas, which are generally in a backward direction. It seems a pity that the fate of the speculative business in this city should be held in such sinewless hands, which only grow tireless in opposing anything of a character likely to benefit an institution in the final stages of decay.

The Boom in Powder Shares.

When it is understood that the high California Powder Company is doing more business in thirty days now than it used to do in six months, and only getting cost price for it, little argument is necessary to establish the proposition that, pooling the interests of all the companies on a basis of profits, no matter how small they may be, would be both sensible and prudent. That an attempt has been made to carry out some plan of this kind will be admitted, the negotiations being, however, of a rather one-sided character so far, with prospects of success dependent entirely upon concessions upon the part of the weaker concerns, which would practically knock them out of the manufacturing field, in particular on especially profitable lines. Does it not seem strange, therefore, with this knowledge of the exact situation, that the Giant stock has been the only one to boom at extravagant rates on the mere prospects of a combine? Here are shares of a company which owes enough now to put up a new powder manufacturing plant, which suddenly jump from $17 to $26.50 in a few weeks, upon the strength of a reported compact which does not affect prices of the stock in other companies, much more favorably situated financially, and yet there are people in the business who will tell you the advance is quite natural, nothing artificial about it at all. Of course not! Judging from the success which has attended for years past operations of the most brazen character, to which cheerful reference could be made, a highly profitable field really exists in this town for some brainy individual capable of work which could really be termed clever.

The Profits in Local Brewing.

The annual meeting of the San Francisco Breweries, Limited, was held in London last month. The Directors paid no dividend, content with wiping out a lot of old debts aggregating between £13,000 and £14,000. The company made a profit last year on a small scale, with larger sales of beer, and flattering prospects are held out for the coming twelve months. The year of 1895 is referred to in the report as one of unprecedented dullness in trade, and to the loss made then is accredited the absorption of the profits this year. The company's trade has been growing steadily of late, and its affairs are now in a condition highly suggestive of future prosperity.

New American Fire Company.

A new fire insurance company, entitled the Inter-Commerce Insurance Company of the United States, is in course of formation in New York. It will have a capital of $200,000, and a surplus of an equal amount. The list of incorporators contains the names of a number of well-known men in financial circles. It is announced that farm property, dwellings, and long-term lists will not be written, but that liberal lines will be written on choice mercantile risks and manufacturing plants with standard sprinkler equipments. It is expected that the company will begin to write business about February 1st.

Mining Gold on the Coquille.

H. H. Vereker left for the Lane mine on the Coquille river, Oregon, on Wednesday last. He will have charge of the engineering department in the working of a new process which the gold mining company is hopeful will prove a success. The Lane mine was always rich, but the gold, being flaky, was lost in large quantities. It is proposed to work over the tailings on the new principles, by which it is proposed to catch the greasy gold from out of the black sand. Mr. Vereker is generally considered well up in the duties of a mining engineer.

Millions Flying in the Air.

The production of gold in California for the past year is estimated at $16,000,000. If the statements appearing in print during the past six months could be credited, about $32,000,000 of foreign gold has been dumped in this State, most of it coming out of the pockets of the Rothschild family. It is little wonder, then, that the ideas of mine owners have been inflated beyond reason by the publication of such ridiculous nonsense. As a matter of fact, money was never tighter in London than it is at present.

CAPTAIN Thomas Mein (formerly manager of the Robinson Gold Mine, S. A. R.), has joined the Boards of the Alaska-Treadwell, the Alaska-Mexican, and the Alaska United Gold mining companies.

The Town Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou!"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

THE TOWN CRIER lately received an invitation to become an honorary member of the holy order of Ancient Colonial Dames, a society composed mainly of antique ladies having proofs positive that their ancestors did not perambulate the streets of their native hamlets with barrows or participate in the furtherance of the welfare of their fellow citizens by occasionally purifying their linen. The TOWN CRIER did not see his way clear to join the antiques, although he can prove the existence of his grandparents as clearly as the eldest of them. The men of his family, as well as the women, have never labored with their hands; as penmen or pickpockets they have ever preferred their fingers. The reason why the TOWN CRIER refused to have his well-sounding and distinguished name emblazoned on the pay roll of the order of Ancient Colonial Dames is that he is a modest man of genteel breeding, and his experience has taught him that ladies who brag about the past refinement of their families are often ignorant themselves of the canons of modern good manners. In other words, the descendants of Colonial Dames are not necessarily ladies.

IT is now as much as any woman's reputation is worth to go to Oakland, or take an afternoon trip to Alameda. Since election, the dailies have had to resort to desperate methods to hatch up sensations, and if a maid or matron happens to go a few blocks from home, or bow to a gentleman on the street, her elopement is a foregone conclusion. The TOWN CRIER is in mortal fear himself every time he raises his hat to a fair acquaintance.

IT is devoutly to be hoped that the acquittal of Mrs. Hartley, slayer of Senator Foley, may not cause another epidemic of crime in this city, in which women will seek to avenge themselves for wrongs real or fancied by the reckless use of loaded pistols. As long as the infuriated sex confines its operations to rolling pins and flatirons, man is comparatively safe.

THE batch of brides turned out this year
From each paternal nest,
Would indicate that papa dear
Is going to have a rest.
And that a younger man must hoard
The cash to pay his daughter's hoard.

AT last the searchlight of investigation is being turned on the prosecuting attorneys and clerks who fatten in the Police Courts. Usually these gentlemen are political bummers, who would appear to advantage behind the bars themselves. Seeing that we cannot hang them, let us at least dispense with their services and keep them from fattening at the public erib.

THAT was a curious blunder in the Examiner of Sunday last, by which David Dudley Field, eminent as a codifier of law, was represented as "the codfisher." The Call of the same day used the word "thorax" instead of "larynx," throughout an article on the resuscitation of persons apparently drowned. Where are the proof-readers?

ONE Lapizonda, a fourth-rate actor, has been arrested for grand larceny. Was it necessary to trump up such a long-delayed charge as that? Why not have run him in at the outset of his career on the far more serious offense of bad acting?

SCARCE have we wished each other well in greeting,
Scarce is the glad New Year upon its way;
When we are told that there will be a meeting
Of women and their congresses in May.
Oh, vanished hope of peace that was to be!
We thought that '97 would set us free!

BY all means let the City Hall be renovated and cleaned by responsible parties. In the meanwhile, every man emerging from its doors should be placed for a time in quarantine, so as not to pollute his fellows.

IT is to be supposed that Colonel Dan Burns found another mine at Sacramento.

A LOCAL daily says that the doctors disagree. Their medicines and their charges have disagreed with their patients to such an extent, no doubt, that the disturbance has reached the medicos themselves.

They cure us with their horrid pills
These wily, learned men,
And then present their monstrous bills
To make us sick again.

SHARKEY denies that he is about to be married. This is not strange. The woman of to-day who weds does so with the intention of doing all the subsequent knocking-out that is necessary. She is not apt to flee such defeat at the outset as the bride of a Sharkey must contemplate. Pugilists are not the most desirable matrimonial prey.

THE very latest device for free advertising has been introduced by Yaw, the steple-noted vocalist, who circulated the report that she had died without even time in which to say her prayers. It worked to a charm. We may now expect to hear of the demise and subsequent resurrection of every professional in the country.

FROM the lively manner in which young women are attempting to die for love lately, it would seem that the teachings of the man-hating New Woman, which at one time threatened to uproot sentiment from the hearts of womenkind generally, have had no influence after all—at least not around these diggings.

THE TOWN CRIER suggests that Jake Rudolph be incarcerated in a jail for life, and as he seems to have a fondness for using his fingers, he might put in his time making jute bags, or some such useful articles. For such a fellow to be allowed to roam the streets, is to endanger the life of every law-abiding citizen.

JOHN THOMPSON, the man who has been arrested for stealing sugar from a grocer, need not be despondent. He should demand that the pilfered commodity be analyzed, bribe the chemist to swear that it is merely a mixture of cornstarch and sand, and the rest is comparatively easy sailing.

OH where is T. V. Cator gone.
The Populistic Thunder Bird?
Nay, can it be, so crushed is he
That never more will he be heard?
Or will he wait a few short years
And melt our hearts again with tears?

D. E. WILEY, the man who befriended a youth named Julius Hirsch, saved him from starvation and other inconveniences and got robbed by him as a reward for his kindness, will probably conclude that the role of the Good Samaritan is all very well, but that it does not work with highly desirable results in San Francisco.

HORNED rattle-snakes are said to be plentiful in Death Valley, but one does not need to go outside the city limits for snake lore. For variety, liveliness, abundance and brilliancy, the breeds vouched for by some of the TOWN CRIER's bucolic acquaintances cannot be surpassed.

IT must have been extremely embarrassing for the landlady whose boarder died at her table the other day. Results of the average boarding house regime are usually of a fatal character, but they are seldom so suddenly developed.

HALF-A-DOZEN pages of Funding Bill matter in Tuesday's Examiner saved the public from an equal amount of fake news and morbid sensationalism. This was, indeed, something to be thankful for.

TEN coroner's inquests and ten divorce suits in one day may not be much of a record in New York City, but for San Francisco it is a fair average, and shows that we are not as silurian as some folks think.

NOW that the "Octopus" has been downed, what will become of Uncle Suro? Sooner than fade from out the public's notice, we fear he will start a railroad himself.

WANTED: The photo of a bride who was not declared to be beautiful by the society reporter at the wedding.

THE Exhumer rightly considers itself a fly paper. Even dollars stick to it.

DEAR EDITH:—The newest designs for evening gowns which have come from Paris in the past fortnight are extremely elegant and betray a slight reaction from the very ornate patterns which have been so much in vogue during the past months. In every instance the costume is made of the same material, both waist and skirt, and in most of these the two are separate garments. In one out of three the robe is a masterpiece of fitting, and flows in uninterrupted and graceful lines from the shoulder or the inferior line of the corsage to the floor. Each design is décolleté. There is a slight variation in treatment, although the general type may be said to be cut rather low in the front and the middle of the front, and to run upward in a curved line to the shoulder or the edge of the shoulder, and thence downward in a graceful curve to the middle of the back. The variation depends upon the figure of the wearer. Where the shoulder is ugly or angular the shoulder strap and decoration conceal it. Where it is rounded or beautiful, the decoration passes on the outside. Where the upper arm is plump and handsome, it is exposed from just above the elbow to a thin line of shell trimming in silk, ribbon, crepe or lace or a festoon of flowers at the edge of the shoulder.

Bolero jackets are as much worn as ever, in spite of hopes, protests and prognostications against their again appearing in exclusive circles as good style. They are universally becoming, and are triumphant as a finish to the natty street costumes, for which they are particularly appropriate. Some of them are made of elegant brocades, which need no trimming except on the edge, and are slashed almost to the neck in the back, showing a handsome, plain, rich effect in the waist underneath. For the young miss they are trimmed all around the edge with a fine knife-plaiting of chiffon about three inches in depth, while others have a fine silk or headed fringe. One of the newest ideas in bolero jackets is to trim the shoulders with caps or frills to fall over the top of the sleeve in the waist beneath.

A bridesmaid's dress seen recently was of pale green silk made with full skirt, relieved only by a twist of mousseline de soie around the foot. The waist was a round one of the same silk, entirely veiled with green mousseline de soie. This gave a very fairylike look to the dress. A long silken sash of green was wound around the waist and tied at the side with small loops and long ends. The throat, which was cut square, was finished with a twist of the same silk. The sleeve puffs were of green silk and were quite full. They were put on to look like small halloons or the mythical wings of a goddess. The floating ends of the sash, the sleeve puffs and the lightness of the mousseline de soie gave this dress a particularly airy appearance.

Tucks are still used on skirts, bodices and sleeves in many ways, and these can be made with far more effect than the simple style of decoration might be deemed capable of. The tucks may run wide or narrow, or both in conjunction, they may be straight or diagonal, in short, tucking a garment, like shirring it in smallest silk stitches, can be made quite a fine art, and the fashion prevails this season among the heaviest as well as the most diaphanous textiles.

A DREAM.—MESTER CALDWELL OALEY, IN LADIES' HOME COMPANION.

UPON a time, so sweet, so dear, a dream
Came floating through the watches of the night;
With gentlest touch, unlocked the gates of will,
And all my striven-for patience put to flight.

Untrammelled by Necessity's strong hold,
For she had closed her tired eyes in sleep,
Free as the air, forth in Elysian fields
Of gloriou's fancy my strong soul did leap.

There, with glad feet, and heart all fluttering fast;
With sweet presentiment of bliss unsolved,
I wandered, knee-deep, through the fragrant grass;
While 'neath a cloudless sky the world revolved.

And then, as naturally as shone the Sun,
Came one to meet me, through the blossoming ways;
Like two blithe, care-free children, there we strayed,
And plucked from Ages' hoard the flower of days.

And never, never while I live alone,
Shall e'er depart the meoory of that day;
While, warm within my heart, the touch of hand,
Of whispered words, and clinging lips shall stay.

And still, with tender arm about my life,
The dear, sad angel of Renunciation stands,
And says: "Have patience, aoul; thy garden fair
Thou'lt find beyond the years in happier lands."

DIVIDED.—FLORENCE A. JONES.

O God! that hapless dead should vex our peace!
Why should she follow me with grave bound feet,
Haunting me with those dead eyes, stern and sweet;
Standing with clasped hands, while I pray release?

In the long, awful watches of the night
I hear her trailing garments on the stair;
I smell the one dead rose that decks her hair;
I know just where she stands, so still and white.

I feel a cold, dead hand clasp close my own;
Poor little hand, that wears no wedding ring;
Dear hand, that with love's wont gave everything;
O, little hand, would God I could atone!

O wife, whose dark head nestles on my heart,
You, whom I honor as sin honors good.
The perfect type of pure, cold womanhood,
You do not dream how far we are apart!

Alas for him whose wisdom comes too late!
I know that, after all, love's way is best,
The love that giveth all, at Love's behest;
O, bitter-sweet! O, love insatiate!

THE EMPTY HOUSE.—WESTMINSTER BUDGET.

To think the moonlight shines to-night
In the dismantled rooms that were Love's own, the moonlight, cold and white,
Upon the desolate walls and here!

To think the dawn shall rise and flood
The empty house that was Love's own,
Wherein Love's hours were warm and good,
Wherein Love's heart hung heavy as stone!

To think I shall come there no more
To the familiar place, to know
The stranger's foot shall cross the floor
Of old where I was wont to go!

O house that like a little ghost
Calls to me through the night and rain,
I know not if I love you most
For all the joy or all the pain:

For hours in which my joy lay dead,
For hours in which all heaven I knew—
Only my life, when all is said,
Leaves an immortal past with you!

Your chimney has as much to do with your light as your lamp has.

Plugwinch—Congratulate me, dear boy! I'm engaged to the wealthy Mrs. Gradster. PIGSNUFFLE—So glad, old man! But—er—are you sure she is really so rich? PLUGWINCH—Sure? I should say so! Why, she was arrested for shoplifting and acquitted as a kleptomaniac.—Truth.

A SPECIMEN OF CUBAN CORRESPONDENCE.

OFF FLORIDA KEYS, January, 1897.

From the Honorable H. Ballou de St. Mahoney to any paper that will print it. DEAR MR. EDITOR.—Feeling it my duty as a representative of the great American people to use my God-given talents in their service, I resolved to visit Cuba and probe the lamentable situation there to the bottom. I have done so, and from this moment the United States may lay aside her fears as a garment. I took two of my lives in my hand in facing both a Spanish and an Insurgent death. That is nothing. Providence has miraculously preserved me to tell my story to a breathless world.

I landed in Havana on the —th, and at once hunted up lodgings on a back street. Reporters of every tongue and clime followed me, importunate for interviews. I slipped into my apartments and locked the door, intending to remain until morning. At dinner time the landlady informed me that there was nothing to cook. She said: "Things have been mighty scarce, Señor, since they stopped grindin' cane."

I remembered noticing, as I came along the street, that our house backed up against a yard in which there was a chicken coop. To steal out the back way, climb the fence, avoid the dog, and return with a fine fowl, was the work of only a couple of hours for me. The next morning I called on General Lee, who took me at once to the Captain-General. We discovered General Weyler hard at work on a typewriter. He is a little man, not bigger than Uncle Ben Harrison, but fiercer. When he saw me, he clambered down from his stool, raised himself on tip-toe, threw his arms around my neck, and sobbed for joy. His true soldierly instincts had recognized me.

"I am glad you came," said he, "I wish all the Americans would come and see for themselves how things are here."

"General," I replied solemnly, "I have come to learn the whole truth about this Cuban uprising. What report shall I make to my countrymen?"

He laid his thin forefinger along his Spanish nose, which first saw the light in Ohio, and, with a candid twinkle in his eye, he said: "Mahoney, there is nothing in it."

Just then a bullet crashed through the window, plunked its way through his military chapeau, and passed out by way of the opposite wall. Without a tremor, the General turned to an aide: "Go, Captain," said he, "and tell those Cubans that, if they want to practice target shooting, they must go down into Pinar del Rio, where it won't disturb me."

He turned to me kindly, and asked. "Where were you last night, Mahoney? Your strange disappearance for some hours has been cabled to every capital in Europe, and I am just writing an explanation of it for the Imparcial, at Madrid."

"I was out foraging—I mean reconnoitering the insurgents," said I, "in the interest of my search after the truth."

"I am glad you did," he replied; "the fact that you are alive proves that there are no rebels within a hundred miles of Havana, and that the country is safer to visit than the District of Columbia."

"I intended to ask you for a passport," said I.

"You won't need any," he answered. "A steamer leaves for New York within the hour. I will see you safe on board myself."

He was so urgent that we started at once for the wharf, a company of Spanish infantry following as an escort of honor, I suppose. I parted affectionately from the General, and turned to Lee. "Fitz," said I; "what shall I say to the boys for you?"

"Just tell them that you saw me," he replied, "and say to Olney, privately, that I think just as I did when I saw him last."

The whistle blew, I sprang on board, and was soon at sea, firmly convinced that the Cubans can never be conquered. The evidence on that point is cumulative, and may be summed up as follows:

- First—Morgan and Call say so.
- Second—All the jingo newspapers say so.
- Third—General Lee thinks so, and
- Fourth—To cap the climax, General Weyler says there are no rebels, and, if there are none, how can they be conquered?

I give the result of this mission in detail, because it will be of immense value to history.

P. S.—Please inform me what you pay per line, when you remit.

THE death of Mr. Alexis Janin, on Wednesday last, robs the country of one of its most noted mining engineers. He was born in New Orleans in 1846, and was educated in Paris, taking his first degree at the Sorbonne, the head government school in that metropolis. Later on he took up the profession of mining in Germany, and then came to this country, where he became identified with the Comstock mines. He has been connected, in one way or another, with nearly all the larger mining properties.

AT THE CAPITOL.

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 13, 1897.

NOW that the Senatorial fight is over, it is to be hoped that the Legislature will settle down to work, for work it must if ever the mass of bills now before both houses are carefully considered—as they are supposed to be—in the next six weeks still remaining of the session.

What I said last week about the economical Assembly was only correct,—as events have since demonstrated,—in so much as the permanent organization is concerned; but in the amount paid for temporary organization the record has been broken and in this regard come murmurs of the first scandal of the session. Over $4000 was paid the temporary officers and attaches, and I have seen figures where when Ed. Leake was Chief Clerk and temporary organizer of the Assembly the expense was hardly $400. This robbery of the Treasury, for it is nothing else, should receive the attention of the Legislature and Chief Clerks who are anxious to please every member of the majority in order to ensure their re-election, should be prevented from perpetrating a repetition of this year's outrage. As it is, the law permits the Chief Clerk to appoint such temporary attaches as he sees fit, and the gates for patronage-seekers being left open in this careless manner the hungry gang rushes in to help raid the Treasury. Of course, if these persons earned any part of the money paid them it might partly justify the steal, but they don't. The law provides that certain officers shall hold during the temporary organization. They are sufficient numerically and should be in ability to do the work required.

The scandal to which I refer has been gossiped around all the week and it is to be hoped this petty larceny steal will be properly and thoroughly investigated. I simply give you the rumors and hope the publication of them will cause the offender or offenders to receive their just deserts. In brief, so the story goes, all the temporary attaches who were allowed mileage payable out of the contingent fund of the Assembly, some six or seven in number, whose total mileages amounted to slightly over $100, were compelled to "divvy" with the Committee on Mileage's chairman. Assemblyman Oscar F. Breiling, of the Alameda County delegation, is chairman of this committee. Being told of the reports he denied the truth of them and said he would investigate. It is to be hoped that he will clear himself, for although Assemblymen come cheap, $50 is a remarkably small price for one to sell himself and to seven persons at that. Of course, there may be some one else who is to blame and perhaps Breiling is, as he says, innocent, so I give him the full benefit of the doubt. The fact remains and I have it authoritatively that the attaches were compelled "to divvy" their mileage. Besides this, I understand there is absolute proof that the temporary roll of attaches was stuffed by some one and a special committee is trying to find out who did it.

The fight won by Leslie Blackburn, of Alameda, for Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate was an unprecedented one. He was opposed by members of his own county delegation, and bitterly, too, and besides, was nominated in caucus by a Senator from another part of the State. However, he had made so satisfactory a record two years ago, and his supporters were more than enthusiastic in his behalf, so opposition was futile. Mr. Blackburn is a man of pleasing personality, and his experience has especially fitted him for the position he has ably and, I prophesy, will again satisfactorily fill. In politics, it is needless to say, he is a staunch Republican, and is a leader in Alameda County, which by no means bounds the extent of his personal and political influence and popularity. As Deputy Sheriff, under Sheriff Hussey of Alameda county, he rendered the State effectual service. For four years, Mr. Blackburn filled the onerous position of Deputy United States Marshall of Arizona, and gained much praise from high quarters. He also took an active part in Virginia City politics in the early days, and can count as his friends to-day all the most prominent people of that State.

In the house over 300 bills have been introduced and in the Senate over 275 bills, so it is evident there is plenty to do.

The occasion of the election of George C. Perkins, on Tuesday, gave an opportunity to judge some of the orators in both houses.

In the Senate Senator George C. Perkins was placed in nomination by Frederick S. Stratton, of Alameda County, and his speech was an oratorical effort that was worthy of the occasion and the person in subject. The galleries and the lobby of the Senate Chamber were crowded, and the attention given to Mr. Stratton's speech, and the applause that greeted the conclusion of his effective presentation, proved that Mr. Stratton's reputation as an orator was well founded.

Frederick S. Stratton.

Though a young man in years, Senator Stratton is easily one of the ablest men in the Senate, and, as a compliment to his abilities and energy, besides being Chairman of the Committee on Elections, he is a member of the important committee on City, City and County, and Town Governments, County Government, and Township Organization; and Judiciary.

Last November he was elected State Senator from the Twenty-Seventh District by a phenomenal majority, and that he will well merit the confidence reposed in him goes without saying. As an attorney, Mr. Stratton has already made his mark, and the list of important cases won by him not only show his ability, but also his versatility.

Mr. Stratton has much important legislation in hand, and many of the bills he has introduced are of great importance, and their passage will result to much good to the public, who are not slow, it is to be hoped, to appreciate a man like Mr. Stratton, of more than average talents and ability.

Senator R. N. Bulla, of Los Angeles, who ably represents the Thirty-seventh Senatorial District, seconded the nomination of Senator Perkins. His speech was a splendid effort, but not at all a surprise to his friends who are fully aware of his abilities, for Senator Bulla is not alone a good talker, but an energetic and faithful worker as well. This is his first term as Senator, although he was sent to the Assembly from his district for two consecutive terms. At home Mr. Bulla practices law, and stands high in his profession. As chairman of the very important Committee on Claims, Retrenchment, and Public Expenditures, and as a member of the Committees on City, City and County, and Town Government; Constitutional Amendments; Elections; Judiciary, and State Prisons and Prison Buildings, Senator Bulla will find plenty to do, and with his untiring energy and devotion to his work, will prove equal to the occasion.

Senator R. N. Bulla

and devotion to his work, will prove equal to the occasion.

Senator J. N. Gillette's seconding speech, also for Senator Perkins, was not less eloquent than those which preceded him. Senator Gillette has an easy style of delivery,

Senator J. N. Gillette

and the First District, which he represents, has in him a fitting successor to ex-Senator Frank McGowan, whose reputation as an orator is State wide. Mr. Gillette is an attorney at Eureka, Humboldt County, where he has a large practice and a large constituency whom he will, I am sure, serve with credit and ability. This is Mr. Gillette's final term in the Legislature, but for six years he was City Attorney of Eureka. He is Chairman of the important Committee on City, City and County and Town Government, and a member of the Committees on Bank and Banking, Commerce, Harbors, Rivers, and Coast Defenses; Counties and County Boundaries; Judiciary; and Public and Swamp and Overflowed Lands. Mr. Gillette has already introduced several important measures, and the fish industries of Humboldt County, and the State dairying interests will receive his careful and most energetic attention.

Senators Dickinson and Smith also made seconding speeches, which were well delivered and nicely received.

In the Assembly by far the best speeches were made by those gentlemen who nominated "lost causes." Judge E. A. Bridgford, of Colusa, placed James G. Maguire in nomination, and E. J. Emmons, of Kern, nominated T. V. Cator. Their speeches were the best of the day. Judge Waymire, of Alameda, who nominated Senator Perkins, made a good speech, and Assemblymen Bettmann and Hill seconded the nomination.

On Monday last Mr. George M. Francis, of Napa, was elected unanimously the bearer of California's electoral vote to Washington, and left San Francisco for that city on Thursday. Mr. Francis is one of the best-known Republicans in this State, and besides his good war record, has made a reputation for himself as one of the leading journalists of that party. He gained his first taste of fighting in 1862, when, at the age of 18, he was sent from Wisconsin, where his home was, to help put down some Indian troubles in the north. That took three months, and then he went South to Kentucky. His commanding officer was the famous "Fighting Joe" Mower, a reckless fire-eater, and Mr. Francis had many opportunities of distinguishing himself. He participated in "Sherman's march to the Sea," and was fortunate enough to come out of the war with much honor and his life. Mr. Francis then worked on the old La Crosse Republican, and finally went to San Francisco. That was twenty-six years ago, and a year later he acquired an interest in the Napa Register, a strong Republican journal. Many leading journalists of to-day have at one time or another been his partners, but for the last fifteen years he has run his paper alone. He is a genial gentleman, and makes friends of all with whom he comes in contact. Mr. Francis expects to be absent from the State about a month. Mrs. Francis accompanies him to Washington, and when his duties are performed he will indulge in a well-merited holiday trip through the East before resuming his editorial duties.

George M. Francis

The Honorable Leon Dennery, who represents the 43rd District—the "Tenderloin" of San Francisco, made a speech in the Assembly last week that ought to live in history. Speaking on a resolution to allow $100.40 mileage to some attaches, Mr. Dennery, who has a lovely lip and a colloquial manner of expression, said: "Mister Speaker: I don't tink its wight to impune de motives of de committee. Here we are chewing de wag and wasting one hundwed dollars and eighty cents wert of time and de whole bill is only one hundwed dollars and forty cents. I tink de wesolution ought to be adopted. See!"

IF last week was one of dinners, among the most noticeable of them being those given by Mrs. Josselyn, Mr. Whittier and Mr. Greenway, this week has been largely devoted to luncheons. It was too bad that Miss Julia Crocker should have had such disagreeable weather for her luncheon on Wednesday, her first appearance as hostess since her return from abroad; her guests were all young ladies, who were invited to meet Miss Noyes. Mrs. Frank Pixley chose cards as the medium for entertaining the young friends of her niece, Miss Edith Nelson, on Thursday afternoon, and a large number were present in her pretty rooms that day.

Mrs. Tingley Lawrence presided over a pleasant gathering on Monday evening, when original readings of reminiscences of life in Corea were given, under the title of "An Evening in the Land of the Morning." Mrs. W. J. Lowrey and her daughters gave a tea on Tuesday afternoon, and entertained a large number of guests. On Wednesday the Baroness Von Meyerinck gave an "at home," when Miss Ida Chase Lee gave a talk on the "Attitude of the Vocalist." Quite a number of our beaux and belles went across the bay to the cotillion in Oakland on Wednesday evening, and were guests of the ladies who chaperoned the party. On Thursday the Mills Club gave a tea in their new quarters in the Native Sons' Building, between the hours of three and five o'clock. To-day, at the studio of Miss Marie Withrow, Miss Ida Chase Lee will repeat her "Vocalist" talk.

Pink, white and green were the dominating hues in the decorations at the wedding of Miss Clemence Reiss and Adolph Nordman, which took place at the Concordia Club, on Van Ness avenue, on Tuesday last. The ceremony was performed in the ballroom, which was wreathed with holly, hung with golden bells, and festooned with pale pink and Nile green bunting, studded with golden stars, and underneath a pink and green canopy at the south end of the room, Rabbi Voorsanger tied the nuptial knot. To the strains of the Mendelssohn wedding march the procession entered the room, which was filled with guests, at half-past six, the ushers, Messrs. Reiss, Feigenbaum, Galland and Blum coming first; then followed the ring bearer, little Miss Jeanne Block, in a frock of white gauze over pink silk, and the flower girls, Rosa Block and May Nordman, similarly attired. Then appeared the bridesmaids, Misses Julia Reiss, Nanette Reiss, Bessie Nordman, Wanda Galland and Helen Blum, gowned alike in white tulle over white silk, and carrying bouquets of pink roses. Miss Flora Reiss, as maid-of-honor, came next, wearing white tulle over pink silk, and finally the lovely bride and her father, Bernhard Reiss. The bridal costume was of white duchesse satin, trimmed with tulle and orange blossoms, a tulle veil confined to her coiffeur by a spray of orange blossoms, and the bridal bouquet was of lilies of the valley. Mrs. Leon Nordman accompanied the groom, who was supported by Jesse Newbauer as best man. After the ceremony an elaborate dinner was served in the banquet hall of the club; then followed dancing until a very late hour. Coronado has been the scene of the honeymoon.

February 4th is the date set for the wedding of Miss May Scott and N. Castle, and will be but a very quiet affair, owing to the recent death of the groom's father, etc. It will take place at the Scott residence, on Vallejo street.

Among the engagements of the new year are those of Miss Sarah Bluxome and James Wooster, with the Easter-tide named as the time for their wedding. The engagements have also just been made public of Miss Teen Goodall and Hugo D. Keil, and of Miss Mahel Estee and Leonard Everett, and the wedding will likely be an event of the near future, probably before Lent.

There have been many hops and small dances given at the Presidio during the past few years, the majority of which have been extremely pleasant, as button gatherings generally are, but the dawn of '97 will see the first ball given at that post in a long period of time. "The officers of the United States Army stationed at the Presidio" will be the hosts at this enchanting affair, which will take place at the Presidio next Tuesday evening, and, it is a foregone conclusion, but few, if any, regrets will be sent.

It goes without saying that the football game of last Saturday was a gala affair, drawing such a crowd of society lights as have not before been seen together this winter. The Army and Navy team have been made great heroes of for their defeat of the University fellows, and their heads are well-nigh turned by the compliments showered on them by the fair ones who witnessed their triumph. Another feather in their caps was the success of the cotillion arranged by the Army chaps for the Friday Fortnightly Club, which was danced last evening, and which must receive fuller notice next week.

The Colonial Dames held their first meeting in the new year at Mrs. Selden Wright's last week, the chief feature of the gathering being the very interesting paper read by Mrs. Henry Gibbons on "the causes which led to the American Revolution." Then there was tea and light refreshments, and a lively chat much enjoyed by the ladies who were present.

The Laurel Hall Club was another of those which had an entertainment last week, introducing some new arrivals in the city, Mr. and Mrs. Henri Fairweather, who gave "An English Mosaic of Old Ballads," a lecture followed by songs, which proved both interesting and entertaining.

The fancy dress german of the Entre Nous Club, which will be given in Maple Hall on Friday evening, the 29th, promises to be a very brilliant affair. The ladies of the Club are busily preparing their costumes, some of which will be dainty and fetching in the extreme, and all will be new and handsome, and the evening is looked forward to with expectant delight by all who are lucky enough to be the guests on that occasion.

Other anticipated delights are the concert parties to hear Nordica and her company, who will warble for us next week.

The remaining Thursdays in January and those in February have been named by Mrs. John H. Jewett to be "at home" to her friends. Mr. and Mrs. A. Hecht will give a hall at the San Francisco Verein Club this evening, which will be a very brilliant affair.

Recent arrivals from the Orient include Mr. and Mrs. Walter Newhall, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Rothchild, all of whom returned from a trip to Japan by the steamer Coptic.

Mrs. Yemans gave a very pleasant progressive euchre party Friday, January 8th, at the residence of her father, Mr. D. J. Staples, 711 Taylor street. There were five tables, the prizes being won by Mrs. H. L. Van Wyke, Mrs. J. B. Schroeder, Miss Rosaline Bryant, and Mrs. Blue.

Mrs. Elizabeth Carroll and William Robinson Whittier will be married on the 27th inst. at the residence of the bride's mother, 1520 Van Ness avenue. Archbishop Riordan will perform the ceremony, and only the immediate relations of the contracting parties will be present.

It is not generally known that Miss Maude Hines, who played such a dainty Ethel Oranger in A Serious Tangle at the Alcazar last week, is an Alameda girl. Moreover, this performance marked her professional début.

The Land of the Midnight Sun has brought to Morosco's the old-time appearance of melodramatic prosperity.

Much of the worry attendant upon giving a large dinner or banquet can be dispensed with by placing the whole matter in the hands of a competent caterer. Mr. Max Abraham, of 428 Geary Street, attends to all the leading society banquets in this city and by utilizing his experience and services thorough satisfaction is assured in every detail.

The World, the Flesh and the Devil

EVEN apart from its biblical association, the River Jordan is of great interest. During its course it falls over 1,200 feet. At no point is it navigable, even by small craft, to any considerable distance, and presents the unique spectacle of a river which has never been navigable, flowing into a sea which contains not one living creature.

—Since Leo XIII. has filled the chair of St. Peter he has repressed the humorous side of his nature which made him greatly in demand as a diner-out while filling the office of nuncio at Brussels. Always severe in matters of propriety, he was deeply offended on one of these occasions by a baron who passed him a snuff box on the lid of which was enameled a feminine figure en deshabille. Admirably controlling his annoyance, his future holiness replied: "Very pretty! Is it your wife?"

—Manuel Garcia, the once famous singer, will celebrate the ninety-first anniversary of his birth on April 17. His friends in London intend to commemorate the occasion in a fitting manner. Garcia was born in Madrid in 1805. With his father he went to Naples, where he became a pupil of the tenor Auzani. Later he became a professor at the Paris Conservatory and also at the Royal Academy of Music in London. Jenny Lind was one of his pupils.

—Germany has made some bold experiments at railroad speed on the line between Berlin and Gortitz. The best performance was 65½ miles, which was twelve miles better than the highest speed of the fastest German train, the Berlin Hamburg lightning express, which does 117½ in 3½ hours. Ordinary German express trains make 49½ miles an hour.

—A recent sale of books in London brought out a curious fact. It was a presentation copy of Keats' poems, 1817, first edition, with the autograph "To W. Wordsworth, with the author's sincere reverence," and worth $230, but Wordsworth had never cut the leaves.

—The Paris Figaro, in remarking on the perfect figure of the beautiful queen of Servia and of the exquisite and stately carriage of her head, attributes it to the fact that her majesty has never used a pillow and that she was trained from girlhood to sleep on a narrow, hard mattress.

—To keep the 30,000 odd miles of telegraph line in order in Great Britain and provide for the proper dispatch and delivery of the millions of messages that pass over them every month, entails an expenditure of about $11,250,000 a year.

—A useful charity called the London Spectacle Mission provides spectacles for needle-women and other deserving persons dependent on their eyesight for a living. Last year 726 applicants were provided with spectacles.

In response to many inquiries from all parts of the country about the Railway and Dock Construction Company

The officials hereby give full information in regard to the company, its business and prospects.

The company offers 20,000 shares of stock for sale in lots to suit purchasers at $20 per share. The par value is $100 per share—full paid and unassessable—stockholders have no individual liability whatever. The company has no indebtedness of any kind—is in solid financial condition—and, as there are no bonds nor mortgages, all the earnings go to the stockholders.

The adoption of this Company's system of construction by the United States Government, or any Foreign Government, or by any one of the large cities in America or Europe will cause the stock to rise above par ($100) immediately.

The most conservative investors, old shrewd bear operators on the stock exchange, have bought this stock and confidently predict it is sure to pay large dividends and sell at over $200 a share as the Railway and Dock Construction Co. commence business under much more favorable conditions than did the Bell Telephone Co., whose stock rose from about $10 to over 200; or the original Edison Electric Co., whose stock rose from 45 to $3000 a share, or the many other companies owning useful inventions whose stocks rose rapidly in value while paying large dividends to the alert original investors.

Many prominent men in banking, railway and financial circles and other expert judges of stock values predict that this stock will pay large dividends and will sell at over $200 per share for the following reasons:

The Railway and Dock Construction Company controls all the rights, titles, patents and interests in and the sole, absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell the new indestructible piles that do away altogether with the millions of wooden piles heretofore used everywhere, which only last a short time, as alternate moisture and drying and the marine worms soon destroy the wood, and leave a deceptive shell, incapable to sustain a load that requires the full strength of the original pile. Old wooden piles must be continually replaced at great expense.

Nothing can compete with the indestructible Pile in the construction of piers, docks, bulkheads, sea-walls, foundations for bridges, lighthouses, jetties, breakwaters or other improvements in rivers, harbors or on the sea coast.

This pile is an absolute necessity in railway trestlework as it guarantees safety, and it will last forever, and there is an enormous demand for it.

One defective wooden pile derailing a train causes a loss of many thousands of dollars in lives and property destroyed.

Applications are pouring in from engineers, contractors and railway officials all over the United States. These men are quick to see the certainty of profit. They are perhaps better able to judge than others, because, out of a total of 1891 railroads, 373 of these railway companies are now preparing to build 20,547 miles of new line. The great superiority of the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system of solid, substantial, indestructible trestle work is causing the demand in this special field.

Estimated earnings from this one source of profit will pay $7 per share annual dividends—this is equal to 35 per cent. cash dividends per year on stock bought now at present price of $20 per share.

Other and larger sources of profit will come from contracts now in view, viz:—

In place of the old wooden docks, covered by temporary sheds, which now disfigure the water fronts of our cities, this company will build solid, indestructible piers, on which permanent iron, stone or brick buildings are put up just the same as on land.

Private owners of dock property as well as dock officials in the numerous cities are becoming aware of the great advantage of using the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system of building indestructible piers to make a solid foundation, upon which large buildings can be erected, from which they can get big revenues for rentals, etc.

$27,000,000 have already been expended in improving Southern harbors and their approaches.

In projects now under way over fifty million dollars will be spent in improving navigation in rivers, bays, etc., throughout the country on jetties, breakwaters, and other work in which the indestructible Pile is a great necessity.

The city of New York is spending $5,000,000 a year improving the city water front.

In a private conversation Hon. J. Sergeant Cram, ex-President of the Board of Dock Commissioners said: "There is an immense fortune in this company's system of construction."

The U. S. Senate Committee have recommended the expenditure of eighty million dollars for the protection of our seacoast. About ten millions a year will be spent during the next eight years.

The United States Government spent about $10,000,000 in deepening the entrance of the Mississippi to divert tidal action by old style work, which will be supplanted in future by the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system. $8,000,000 has already been expended on the two immense jetties in the bay at Galveston: they are simply loose rock dumped into the water. Each jetty is about 4 1/2 miles long and forms a continuous pyramid 100 feet wide at the bottom, tapering to 15 feet wide at the top above the water. The Railway and Dock Construction Company build indestructible jetties of the same size at the bottom as the top and save this enormous waste of stone and labor.

The "St. Louis Critic" strongly advocates the adoption of this company's system of indestructible jetties to deepen the Mississippi at St. Louis.

To provide additional funds to execute some of this work, the company offers 20,000 shares to the public in lots to suit at the low price of $20.00 per share in order to have the stock quickly taken. There are no salaried officials. The money derived from the sale of stock, when not used in profitable construction work, remains in the company's treasury.

Many leading marine engineers and experts say: "This company's system of construction is coming into universal use in building all improvements in rivers and harbors."

As the business in sight is too large for this company to handle alone, the subsidiary companies now being organized in the principal States each pay a certain amount in cash and one-third of their capital stock into the Railway and Dock Construction Co.'s treasury. In addition to large sums in cash the company will receive about $20,000,000 in securities in this way, on which dividends will be paid from the earnings of the subsidiary companies. These dividends all go to the holders of Railway and Dock Construction stock.

With a large surplus and an ample cash working capital the company will hold assets of $200 per share for each share now offered at $20 when all details are completed.

Application will be made to list the shares on the stock exchange. Owing to the financial depression and uncertainty before the election the Railway and Dock Construction Company would not accept numerous contracts for work amounting to about three millions of dollars. They were offered first mortgage bonds in payment but the bonds could not be sold at that time in New York or London at satisfactory prices. English bankers are now negotiating to place a large block of Railway and Dock Construction stock and apply for an official quotation on the London Stock Exchange.

The officials and large stockholders are well-known practical financiers and business men, whose names are at once a synonym for trustworthy, capable management and a guarantee that any stock in which they invest is safe, solid and profitable. Among them are:

Among the stockholders are:
 Geo. W. Dunn, Esq., president of the company, head of the banking house of George W. Dunn & Co., New York, and president, director and trustee of other corporations; he has been prominent in Wall Street for 20 years as a careful level-headed financier; Hon. Thomas Murphy, vice-president, ex-Senator, Collector of the port of New York under President U. S. Grant; R. A. B. Dayton, Esq., counsel for the company, Temple Court, New York; Engene Harvey, Esq., second vice-president, banker, Drexel building, Philadelphia, Pa.; E. M. Stanbrough, Esq., Kingston, N. Y.; George D. Hilyard, Esq., contractor, N. Y.; W. R. Childs, Esq., of the Calumet and Hecla Copper Company, Calumet, Mich.; Edward A. Wilson, Esq., secretary; M. Hoff, assistant secretary; George B. Shelhorn, Esq., receiver, Montgomery, Tuscaloosa and Memphis Railway Co., Montgomery, Ala.; Y. Carryer, Esq., of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Field, B. C., Canada; Howard Swineford, Esq., of Howard Swineford & Co., Richmond, Va.; Jacob Deyo, cashier, Huguenot Bank, New Paltz, N. Y.; S. J. Gifford, Dunkirk, N. Y., and several rich and influential railway and political magnates who will have seats in the Board of Directors later on.

Address all applications for stock and remit for the number of shares wanted to the Financial Agents of the company, Messrs,

I never was good at figures, But now that the hall is done I'll square my accounts, and balance Expenses with girls and fun.

Let's see; the tickets two dollars, And four for the carriage and pair, And three for the jacqeminot roses— She looked out of sight I declare.

That's nine. Well, I guess that completes it From the liability side. And now for the assets—one item Is all that I find for a guide.

And yet that lone figure's sufficient To more than offset it—and this Is the fractional part of a minute That I spent in a last good-night kiss.

FOR SHAME, FOR SHAME!

BY WARMAN, IN JUDGE.

I was gazing through the window Of a Paris studio, A kind of hot-house window, At a marble Trilby there, With rounded knolls and dimpled arms And—O, like drifted snow, And wondered if on all this earth Walked woman half so fair. And all about were people Painting pictures of the same. Who paused not when I entered, But, at a signal, they Laid down their paint and pencils, And, O, for shame, for shame! The marble maid stood up and yawned And smiled and walked away.

THE Christian Endeavor visitors will be welcomed heartily to San Francisco next summer. This is a good field for their efforts.

THE "defective flue" is a most wearisome iteration. Is it not possible for the reporters to write in plain English of a faulty chimney?

THE shouters for restrictive taxation of foreign trade, which is so-called protection, are willing to leave the mass of the people to the mercy of trusts and other combinations in restraint of trade.

THERE has been so much war talk during the past twelve months, that Congress should be disposed to grant the requests of General Miles for liberal appropriations. This would mean nearly a million dollars for fortifications of San Francisco. Lime Point would then become, in reality, the "Gibraltar of the Pacific Coast."

THE Chamber of Commerce has taken up the cudgels against extravagance in the Harbor Commission, and the imposition of unnecessary quarantine tolls on shipping. This is one of the most expensive ports in the world for ships, and it ought to be one of the cheapest. Our foreign commerce must languish so long as the existing abuses and exactions continue.

EVERY possible precaution should be taken against the introduction of the East Indian or bubonic plague. The national health authorities have already moved in the matter, and our local and State officials should likewise be alive to the danger. In Bombay thousands have been stricken, the deaths being in the proportion of two out of three.

ONE of the greatest abuses in this State is the allowance of mileage to public officials, in amounts far above the actual cost of transportation. The law should restrict mileage, in all cases, to the sum actually expended. Under the present system, members of the Legislature, for example, receive several times as much as the railroad fare to and from Sacramento. This is an imposition on the taxpayers.

NO more of the people's money should be expended on the Home for the Training of Feeble-Minded Children. The State should not encourage the production of this sort of offspring. The institution is simply a means of enabling parents to shift upon the public the burden of caring for children who should be provided for at home. Pity for the unfortunate should not blind legislators to the mischievous results of the policy represented in the Home mentioned.

MANY of the bills introduced at Sacramento are either wholly needless or altogether absurd. What could be more superfluous than the bill "to prohibit unauthorized persons from wearing the rosette of the Loyal Legion?" It would be just as much in order to prohibit anybody but a mandarin from wearing a colored button on his cap. These things are the subject of severe regulation in China, but have no place in our American system of government.

THE Home Products Exhibition at Los Angeles is a good stroke of enterprise. It shows that the southern city is making good progress in manufacturing industries, and tends to give them increased support.

IN the re-election of Senator Jones, Nevada showed due appreciation of the services and abilities of one of the ablest men in the upper house of Congress. No public man in this country has surpassed Senator Jones in the championship of the silver interests of his State, and he is entitled to his reward.

THE Board of Directors of the Public Library in Plainfield, N. J., at a late meeting, resolved that as purveyor of clean and elevating literature, they could not take the responsibility of retaining on their subscription list papers of the New York World class. The rival of the World is also debarred from their reading-room. These journals can do even more harm in the family than in the library, which suggests the next step in the warfare against evil.

THE new Governor of the State of Washington introduced an innovation upon the occasion of his induction into office last week. The usual custom has been to attend the inauguration of the Governor with carriages, and all the pomp and circumstance of mimic military display. Governor Rogers walked with his friends to the Capitol in the ways of Jeffersonian simplicity, although he is a Populist. It will be a good thing for the people of that State if he continue in this meek and unostentatious path.

PRESIDENT Jordan, of Stanford University, has made an unanswerable argument in favor of exempting such educational institutions from taxation. The University now pays taxes to the amount of thirty thousand dollars annually. This sum could not be more profitably expended for the benefit of the State than in enlarging the usefulness of the institution. And so with all other academies of non-sectarian learning. Our Constitution should be amended in this respect, to conform to the liberal spirit of the age.

THE pending Nicaragua canal bill gives the Government of the United States control and direction of the waterway, through the provision for ownership of seven-tenths of the stock and the selection of a like proportion of the directorate. The stock would be issued to the Government in consideration of the guaranty by the latter of the bonds of the company. With the safeguards provided, there is every reason to believe that the canal earnings could be made to pay the bonds as they mature, as well as a reasonable return on the stock. The existing canal company and the Government of Nicaragua are fairly entitled to the provisions allowed them by the bill.

IT is to be hoped that the Post Office authorities at Washington will see fit to close immediately with the offer made them by our Board of Harbor Commissioners to rent the Government a large and desirable portion of the new Ferry Building for the sum of $1,000 a month. Postmaster McCoppin has given the matter his closest attention, and is satisfied that this figure is not exorbitant, and that the interests of the public will be served by securing quarters for the Postal Department in the new depot. It is owing to this spirit of pettiness and senseless economy, ever manifested by certain officials and a portion of our local press, that San Francisco is often deprived of benefits when just within her grasp.

REFORMING THE COURTS.

AN avalanche of proposals is upon us for reforming the judiciary of the State. Things have got to be so unbearable that a demand is heard on every hand for relief. The calendars of all the Courts are choked, the judges claim to be oppressed with work, finality in litigation is almost unknown, and in the vast majority of instances it is cheaper to abandon a just claim than to endeavor to enforce it by law. In fact, there is a virtual denial of justice in this State that greatly detracts from its desirableness as a place of residence and business. We are not of those who believe that the cause of all the mischief is to be found in the Judges, who, as a rule, are better than the system they administer. Considering the inadequacy of their official salaries, and their obligations to practicing lawyers at election times, the marvel is, not that we secure the services of the best men, but that we get as good men as we do. As long as we have an elective judiciary, we shall have judges on the Bench too weak to discipline the all too many shameless lawyers of the period, who, hound by no rules of court and by no code of honor, turn the judicial machinery into a vehicle of injustice and oppression. If the judges were strong enough to frame strict rules to govern the proceedings in their courts, and to enforce them with uniformity and firmness, more than one half the tricks, subterfuges, perjuries, delays and other abominations that now so often render our courts potent for mischief, but impotent for good, would be done away with. But a stream cannot rise higher than its source, nor can even a judge, strive as he may and often does, become superior to the influences that secure his nomination and election.

One great evil is that we have too many lawyers who must either "get up" cases or starve. They provoke litigation, and, if it is without merit, so much the better. In that case, their skill is exercised in worrying the other side and in warding off, or in devising means to evade a decision. Thus it comes that final judgments in this State are seldom worth the paper they are written on. The attorney has anticipated the result, and by means, probably false, fraudulent, and colorable, has enabled his client, a rascal like himself, to escape the consequences of a too long delayed execution. This is not the exception to the rule, but is the very rule itself. It is a fact that the names of some 2,000 practicing lawyers appear in the San Francisco Directory. 200 capable men would suffice for all the legitimate business there is to do, and that probably is about the number of the fittest that deserve to survive. If the balance could be set to shoveling sand, or to some other useful occupation, we could dispense with one half of our present courts and yet keep abreast of the work in hand. Even as things are, two short rules could be framed that if rigidly enforced would curtail litigation at least one half. First, contracts between attorney and client contingent upon the result, ought to be declared contrary to public policy and void. No officer of the court ought to be pecuniarily interested in the result of litigation. It is contrary to the best traditions of the Bar that he should be, and, if the decisions in the books always prevailed in this State, an attorney so offending could be disharred. Then again, litigation is not made sufficiently onerous to the losing side. It ought to cost more to improperly bring or defend a suit. In extreme cases, the judges ought to exercise their present power of awarding exemplary costs. In older States and countries where the practice of law is subject to strict regulation, the invariable rule is to make the losing side pay all the costs of the winning one. That is equitable and just, and is the best preventive of litigation known among men. A simple amendment to the codes to that effect would work wonders. We should soon hear no more of crowded calendars, congested courts, or overworked judges.

It goes without saying that reform which means reducing litigation to a minimum is not to be expected from lawyers in practice. Their interests lie the other way, and self preservation is the first law of nature. Nobody, therefore, need be surprised that proposals to increase the number of courts, which means an enlargement of the volume of litigation, are the best the lawyers have to offer a long suffering people. It is claimed that twelve departments of the Superior Court are not enough for this city.

If they are not, it is a fact shameful to litigants, lawyers, judges and all concerned. The Bar association proposes to actually create three new appellate courts. The State is to be divided into three judicial districts, and an appellate court, consisting of three judges, is to be given to each. These Courts, we hasten to say, are not intended to supersede the Supreme Court, but are to be an intermediary between it and the Superior Courts. By this arrangement there will, in certain cases, be two appeals instead of one, and, consequently, much more litigation, instead of less. It is a lawyer's measure all through, and must have caused a merry twinkle in the eye, and a laugh in the sleeve of the man who drafted it in the name of reform. It would be amusing, if it were not hurtful to the body politic, to see a lot of hungry lawyers hastening to the Capitol, hutton-holing bucolic members and pretending to clip their own professional wings in the interests of judicial simplicity! Reform of the courts is hadly needed, but it will not come to us that way.

The Senate and the Arbitration Treaty.

It is said that the Senate will hang up the arbitration treaty and let it die. The excuse is made that there is no immediate necessity for it; no issue pending to which it is applicable, and that it will be time enough to consider some such measure when circumstances arise to bring it within the domain of practical politics. That is not the tone or temper of public opinion. Not much is to be expected these times of the U. S. Senate, but its members might reasonably be presumed to know the force of educated thought there is at the back of this measure. The best minds of the country look upon it as a beneficent proposal, well calculated to render war between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race impossible. The fact that there is now no burning issue in existence, only tends to show that this period of calm is just the very time in which to ratify it. To wait for the coming of a time of passion would be folly. The very object of the treaty is to prepare for and guard against the possible arrival of such a period. We suspect the real truth is that the Senatorial dislike of President Cleveland is at the bottom of the disinclination to ratify a treaty that has so much to recommend it. There is too much glory in it for a man whom certain Senators so cordially hate. But they may as well yield and do the graceful thing at once, and thereby save their own credit at home, and the country's abroad. That, or a similar treaty, has got to come, and, when it does, due credit will be given to the President and the able Secretary of State by whom it was first proposed.

The Examiner
and the Park Commissioners.

It would be interesting to know what failure to levy tribute upon the Park Commissioners has caused the Examiner to assail the business capacity, the uprightness and ability of the gentlemen who have charge of the people's great play-ground in this city. Certainly no one who is acquainted with the methods of that paper will for one moment imagine that it is sincere in its attack upon these well-known and highly-respected gentlemen, for it is a clearly-recognized fact that the Examiner interests itself in nothing that does not concern its own pocket-hook. The fact that the men who are faithfully serving the people as Park Commissioners are among the foremost citizens of this city, that they are men of wealth, undoubted character and standing in San Francisco, count for nothing with this disreputable representative of all that is had in journalism. If there be anywhere in this city evidence of faithful performance of duty, of work wisely planned and skilfully executed, it will be found at Golden Gate Park. Comparatively a few years ago, where now beautiful tropical life, refreshing foliage, winding roadways and delightful retreats greet the eye and gratify the taste, was nothing but a wilderness of sand. The work accomplished shows that the people's money has yielded a satisfactory return. Taken alone, the Park is an unanswerable argument for the wisdom of its management, that the Examiner should trail its dirty course across this fair picture, and seek to bring discredit and suspicion upon honorable and patriotic citizens, is but another evidence of its vicious and criminal character.

Remarkable Trade Development.

The year 1896 saw a much more remarkable turn in the tide of our foreign commerce than most people are aware of. The report of the United States Bureau of Statistics, just issued, shows that we are now importing so much less, and exporting so much more, that the balance of trade is now heavily in favor of this country. The figures are exhilarating and inspiring in the highest degree. For many years prior to 1896, the national trade balance with other nations was on the wrong side of the ledger. We took more from them than they bought from us. We sold all that we had to sell, which was not a little, but we sent away all too much money for high-priced luxuries that we could well have done without. An era of extravagance had been upon us for years, and although in 1893 we were suddenly confronted with a money panic and hard times, it took us two years to begin to learn to mend our ways, retrench our individual expenditures, and live within our means. But it is, happily, clear that the nation, as a whole, has learnt the needed lesson at last. During the first ten months of 1896, for which alone the figures are complete, the balance of foreign trade in favor of the United States amounted to the immense sum of $266,086,709, whereas, during the same period of the previous year we had imported considerably more than we had exported. Between the showings for the two periods there is all the difference in the world. The one led up to the hardest of hard times; the other is the unquestionable precursor of wide-spread and general prosperity. Up to November, cereals had not appreciated much in price, so that the increased business of the year is not due to the accident of a season by which Europe is now being forced to buy our grain in larger quantity and at higher prices. The results of that, for us, happy accident, will come into the returns for 1897, and will cut considerable of a figure there. The export of merchandise is accountable for over 70 per cent. of last year's increase of exports. Wheat, cotton, corn, and other products of the farm make up the other 30 per cent. Exports of bicycles and bicycle appliances increased nearly $3,000,000; shipments to England, Canada, and Australia having grown from almost nothing a year ago to a very active and flourishing trade to-day. Exports of cotton cloths was larger by $5,661,859 in the ten months of 1896 than in 1895, nearly all of the increase coming in our trade with China and Canada, two fields of commerce once surrendered almost wholly to the English manufacturers. Of machinery, our total exports increased $4,593,076 over 1895, and here we have invaded the personal domain of the European manufacturer, for Great Britain and the European States took from us upwards of five millions more than in the preceding year. In practically every other branch of American manufacture, including leather, lead, zinc, wood and paper goods, manufactured tobacco, and canned provisions, there has been an increase over 1895 running from 5 to 200 per cent. Our Treasury reserve of gold is no longer in danger of depletion. We are now lending part of our trade balance in London and Berlin, where money is actually worth more than in New York. This trade development, remarkable as it is, will show even more astonishing enlargements during 1897. The better prices now being realized for cereals and cotton will largely increase the figures. These signs of the times are not to be mistaken, and are full of good cheer.

Greater New York and Its Charter.

Greater New York will contain a population at least six times larger than that of San Francisco. It embraces the consolidated cities of New York, Brooklyn, Long Island, and environs. As our people seem unable to make up their minds as to what they really do want in the way of a charter, it will be interesting to note that the Empire City finds no like difficulty. A charter commission, made up of some of the ablest men of the State, has framed a measure that gives a fair degree of satisfaction, and is pretty sure of adoption by the Legislature. It provides for a legislative department, consisting of two chambers, but it takes care to leave this little Parliament absolutely powerless, except when it agrees with the Mayor. It cannot vote bills, involving appropriations of public money, or increasing municipal charges, or granting franchises, except after an interval of five days after the publication of an abstract of the measure, and then only by a three-fourths vote, and, in case of a veto by the Mayor, a five-sixths vote is required. In a great and mixed city, such as the Greater New York will be, such unanimity as against the Mayor could seldom or never be obtained. In addition to this, he is given unlimited executive power, and is in no way beholden to the Legislature in the matter of appointments or removals; except that for cause alleged and proven, the courts may order the discharge of faithless officers. The Mayor is to be elected for two years, and to be paid a salary of $15,000 a year. Very specially noteworthy features of the new charter are the safeguards applied to the legislative power to grant franchises, and the provisions for final assumption by the city of all street monopolies. No new franchise is to be granted for a longer period than twenty-five years, and all franchises, with their plant, appurtenances, property, etc., are to revert to the city at the termination of the period for which they were to originally run, and the city may by ordinance provide for the operation thereof by itself, or by lessees. The price thus paid for the franchise is the value of the improvements effected under it. These are all striking proposals, that, in view of our timid local discussions over charter matters, seem to border upon the hazardous. Yet it is reasonable to believe that there is greater wisdom in the greater city. At any rate, it is time that San Francisco undertook the control of her own affairs. Anything is better than a jumble of laws that defeat each other. A general law could be passed at this session that would considerably ameliorate matters. Such a law should have been devised immediately after the defeat of the charter was known, but then, the interests of this municipality are never looked after as those of a private corporation are. We need a great civic leader. Have we the makings of one in Mayor Phelan?

Success To The Letter-Carriers.

No class of Government employees are more in favor with the public than the letter-carriers. They are noted for faithful and attentive devotion to their onerous duties, and daily exercise a large responsibility in the delivery of important communications, valuable documents, registered money packages and other matter intrusted to their care. They know many secrets gathered in the regular discharge of their tasks, but whoever hears of a letter-carrier recreant to his trust? And yet these efficient and hard-working servants of Uncle Sam must toil through four or five years of probation before receiving regular pay from the Government. During these preparatory years of service as "substitutes" their meager pittance of about $30 a month comes out of the pockets of the "regulars," who are themselves inadequately paid. Under the present system, after securing a regular position, the pay is but $600 the first year; the second year $800, and the third, $1,000. For seven years the Letter-Carrier's National Association has been striving for the passage of an Act by Congress to provide for better remuneration. The measure now on the Speaker's desk was favorably reported from committee, and passed the Senate unanimously in June last. It provides, among its other good features, for a new or additional class, whose members will be entitled to $1,200 a year. This will be for carriers of seven or eight years' service, and it will enable the substitutes to get regular employment earlier than is possible under the present classification. It is known that 230 Representatives favor the bill, and if it should reach a vote at the present session it will certainly become a law. We hope it will be pushed, for it is a most deserving measure, of which the people must cordially approve.

The Degeneracy of the U. S. Senate.

A lamentable sight is just now being witnessed all over the country. A majority of the States are engaged in electing men to the United States Senate who are unfit to go there. Not a man entitled to the distinguished consideration attaching to a member of the highest law-making body in the nation, is visible anywhere along the line. Small men of little mental calibre, and no legislative experience, are being sent to occupy seats once filled by the greatest in the land. Peffer, Hansborough, Kryle, Mitchell, Tillman, and their like, are being made the successors of Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Benton, Sumner, and Seward. It is not alone that from such small Western States as Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, Montana, Nevada, Dakota, and Washington, that these nondescripts are being packed into the United States Senate. New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, the three most populated States in the Union, are doing hardly as well as some of the wild and woolly States. New York had a great candidate in the person of Lawyer Choate. Known all over the country for his learning and ability, and supported by all that was clean and decent in his State, he received just 7 votes, whilst 144 were cast for Tom Platt, the most rascally Boss of modern times. In Pennsylvania, since the retirement of the Camerons, Quay's power has become absolute. He names whom he pleases as his colleague, and the Legislature obeys. With a young ward politician of Philadelphia, named Penrose, he has just beaten John Wanamaker by a majority of two to one. In Illinois, a "boodle" Alderman named Madden, who runs with the "machine," is called "Billy" by the boys, and makes no pretensions to any but "practical" politics, is said to be sure of election. These three States gave McKinley in November pluralities reaching the unprecedented total of 717,500, and therefore underwent what may be supposed to be a new baptism in the cause of honesty, purity, and good faith in Government. That was their answer to the Populist programme of repudiation and dishonor, and yet in each case there rises up out of the victory, in greater power than ever, the despoiling, corrupting power of the Boss, holding Legislatures in his hands, dictating Senatorial elections, and levying tribute on corporations and protected industries. Is it so great a marvel, after all, that the popular party has become a socialist party? Whither are we drifting?

Compulsory Attendance At School. It appears that there are something like 15,000 children of school age in San Francisco who attend neither public nor private schools. That is the estimate of the Census Marshals, and close observers of matters of this kind believe it is not far wrong. The City Superintendent of Public Schools now proposes to enforce the law rendering attendance at school during certain months of the year compulsory. It seems anomalous that in these days of education and enlightenment, so many children of parents who must necessarily pay taxes, should be found wandering the streets instead of undergoing a training to fit them for the battle of life. The schools are free to all, and no excuse on the ground of poverty is available. If judiciously enforced by a discriminating official, the compulsory law is a good one. Of course, in a few extreme cases, which may well be believed to be the exceptions to the rule, it may be found necessary to extend some leniency. There are children mentally or physically unfit to attend school. There are others the sole support of widowed mothers. But there are a great many more who are able to attend school, and whom it is little less than a crime to keep away from there. They are mostly the children of uneducated parents, who need to be taught the value of a school training. To all such, the compulsory law cannot be too soon applied. At the same time, where is the accommodation for such an influx of new scholars? Our understanding is that the existing school buildings are fully occupied already. It is in order for the Board of Education to make known the facts.

A Few Census Facts From France. A glance at the latest French census reveals some curious, and at the same time some alarming conditions. It appears that while all other countries of Europe are gaining in population, that of France is practically stationary, with a decided tendency toward diminution. The largest proportion of births to 100 deaths is found in England, where it is 171. The average of all the European countries is 140. But in France it is only 101. At the beginning of the century France had nearly twice the population of the United Kingdom. At present, notwithstanding the steady loss in England by emigration, that country has 40 millions against less than 39 millions in France. France has gained only about 11 millions during this century, but scarcely any of that small increase has been gained since 1890. The gain for the last five years has been only 124,000, and it is to be noted that 87,000 of that is in Paris alone. In the same period Germany has increased nearly three millions. The causes which are charged with this condition in France are believed to be the practical refusal of all except the laboring classes to bear children; the many obstructions to marriage presented by the laws; the too strict control of parents over the marriages of their children, and the traditions which render a dowry requisite to the wedding of a daughter. Marriage in France is made rather a matter of business, with an eye single to the pecuniary gain, instead of being left to the sentiment, the mutual love and confidence of the sexes. Great effort is made in France to provide a dowry for the daughter, but if the son is to be provided for, or launched in business, the daughter's dowry is sacrificed to him and she condemned to spinsterhood, for what Frenchman would take her sans dot? The increase which France is receiving is from the working classes, and that in itself presents an interesting question as to what the effect is to be on the social conditions of the future. Placed as France is, shoulder to shoulder with the growing military powers of Europe, it is not probable that with decreasing numbers she can maintain her relative strength in armies. Altogether a problem is presented, the solving of which may change the map of Europe.

The Examiner's Own Libel Suits. The Examiner has several libel suits hanging fire. It always has. Never ready to prove its allegations, because they are nearly always malicious and seldom provable, it betakes itself to the miserable, beggarly, contemptible method of hiring pettifogging lawyers to weary the plaintiff out. It has within the past six years gotten rid of more libel suits in that cowardly way than the NEWS LETTER has had brought against it during the more than forty years of its existence. When the libelled one is not a woman, but proves to be a great deal of a man, the Examiner frets and fumes and bullies to the last moment and then—takes water. After hounding Heath of Fresno almost to the gallows, that is how it acted towards him. It was particularly abusive and malicious in the epithets it hurled at Ex-Auditor Strother, vaunted its courage, and pretended that it wished for nothing better than law proceedings. When, however, it was taken at its word, it whined like a whipped cur, begged for mercy, and accepted it at the hands of the man it had done its level best to ruin. The apology it had to publish was simply pitiful in its humility. With such a record, it had better attend to its own libel suits, before intruding its malice into those of others. It does not like the NEWS LETTER and it would be surprising if it did. This journal is considerable of a corrective to the hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness that, perhaps, cause Mr. Hearst's paper to be feared, but certainly not loved. The NEWS LETTER caters not to the crowd, bids not for their nickels, and fears not their frowns. It has a constituency as wide as the world, made up of thoughtful men and women, who have nothing in common with the vilest sheet published on American soil, which is saying not a little. The young scapegrace who owns that sheet may flout his mistress in the face of San Francisco's respectability, may publish her erratic sayings in his two papers, may dishonor the name of the father who begat him and of the mother whose fortune he is squandering, but all that will not constitute him a worthy journalist, or a fit censor of other men, or a true man or anything else that men esteem. He has, however,—one redeeming trait—he never fails to read his NEWS LETTER. If he keeps on he may yet learn that egging on libel suits is contrary to journalistic ethics, beneath contempt, and a game that two can play at.

Salaries and Pickings. The salaries paid to public officials are frequently only a small part of the emoluments of their offices. Inexperienced citizens wonder why there is invariably a warm contest for membership in the Board of Health and the Board of Education, no salaries being paid the members of these bodies. It is not impossible that if the salary of every elected official in this city were abolished, there would be as great a struggle as ever to possess the offices, for politicians would find means of making money out of them by methods as legitimate, in their opinion, as those pursued now. There must be compensations in the Board of Education, or men who have ordinary business to attend to and families to provide for, would not be seeking re-election as School Director term after term. A Director's vote is valuable, for instance, when text-books for the course of study in the public schools are chosen. Some of the selections of the Board are peculiar. The shorthand text book is an example. Phonography is a part of the course of study at the Polytechnic High School. It would naturally be supposed that if the young people there are to become good shorthand writers, able to read the notes of others, and to write notes that others can read, they should be instructed in a standard system. Instead, however, the High School pupils are obliged to study a style of shorthand that is wholly dissimilar from the recognized systems of phonography in this country. There is no intention of easting any reflection here on the so-called Eclectic system that is in vogue at the Polytechnic. It may be good enough, although leading reporters have avoided it because of its alleged lack of practical utility. The only point made is that with other systems in general use throughout the country, the School Directors were led to select a text book which shorthand writers in this city did not employ at all, and the local sales of which have since been limited mainly to the High School. What arguments were used to convince the directors that the High School pupils should be forced to purchase this book, the price of which is high, may be conjectured.

On the Good Roads Movement. The question of improving the roadways, which is a growing agitation in many of the States, makes timely any testimony bearing on the need of such improvements.

On this point we note a valuable contribution from a practical farmer. He states that he lives on a little ten-acre place, eight miles from a railway station. He hauls from the station two tons of fertilizer, making eight loads for one horse, and six hours for each trip, which he calculates to be at a cost of $4.80. His produce consisting of 500 crates of vegetables, is hauled to the railway at a cost of $42.60, requiring, as it does, seventy-one trips in the present condition of the roads, which are heavy and sandy. With the roadway properly improved, he could haul his fertilizer in four trips of four hours each, at a cost of $1.60, and his vegetables in thirty-five trips at a cost of $14. The time spent on the roads requires him to hire an extra man. He figures that the bad condition of the road is a tax of ten dollars per acre each year upon his little farm, which could be saved in horses, time and hired help if the ways were put in proper condition. The same argument applies on a city street. It would be interesting to know what San Francisco pays in horseflesh, broken wagons, and loss of time for the condition of some of her pavements. More than enough, surely, to improve them. A Boston paper says that it costs five dollars to swear on the streets of that city. With the temptation to profanity provoked by our Market street pavement, that figure would be considered remarkably cheap. The interest in good roads which is awakening in California is commendable, and should have the best of support. The NEWS LETTER is pleased to notice the good work being done by our townsman, Mr. Marsden Mansou, and the Bureau of Highways, of which he is an active member. The system of road repairing in the State has been to the last degree chaotic. The report of the Bureau, just issued, shows that the preliminary work on the basis of better methods is well begun. The capable men who are doing it should be kept at it.

A GREAT RUBBER CONCERN.

ON the first page of this issue appears a cut of the greatly extended place of business of the Goodyear Rubber Company, at 573 to 579 Market street, the firm having recently been compelled to enlarge its store to double its former size. The company has been in business in San Francisco for more than thirty years and has grown steadily to the present time. Three years ago it was found necessary to establish a branch house at Portland, Or., where a large three-story building at 73 75 First street, and an additional warehouse at 68-70 Front street are occupied. In this city a large factory is in constant operation at 86-92 Stevenson street, where are made all kinds of rubber goods for mechanical purposes; also a factory for making oil clothing, which occupies nearly the entire block on Virginia avenue, between California avenue and Mission street, where are employed from ninety to one hundred operatives. The output of this plant is among the largest in the country. The business of the Goodyear Rubber Company has doubled within the past three years on this coast, and its goods are found in every market where rubber is used. The company is sole manufacturer of the celebrated crack proof mining boots and Stout's patent snag-proof mining boots. A complete line of rubber stock of all kinds is carried, including belting and packing hose, the company's celebrated Gold Seal brand of which goods is unequalled. Several hundred persons are constantly employed by the company, of which F. M. Shepard is President, R. H. Pease Vice-President and Manager; J. A. Minott, Treasurer; and C. F. Runyon, Secretary. It is one of San Francisco's great mercantile institutions and its success is the direct result of undoubted merit.

'We obey no wand but pleasure's.'—Tom Moore.

THE taste of the Widow of Beyrueth is improving. It is no longer really compulsory to associate the abdominal emboupoint, the general gelatinous blowsiness, the leathern lung and the cast-iron throat with the leading lady of the Wagnerian drama. Lillian Nordica combines a seemly, if not sensational personality with the better traditions of lyric opera and the rugged dramaisms of new Germany. She tries to mean what she sings and half the time succeeds—which is a big average; for song is elusive as we take it now in a bigger dramatic significance. And Nordica's Marguerite, who might be Mrs. Tanqueray, or Nora Helmer, or anybody besides the Gretchen of song and story, is only a large specimen of what Nordica's temperament is not. Nordica is not heroic in the unfeminine sense; but she is too regal, in the deck of cards sense, too sure, in the woman of the world sense, too obviously actorial, in the musical sense, to flutter the pulse in Faust. She sat at the spinning wheel, her fingers hushing over the flax, and hummed, abstractedly, indifferently, "Once there reigned a King in Thule." And this was as it should be. It was real art, not art art. Then, with as much consternation and rapture as a housemaid would exhibit on finding the morning newspaper in its accustomed corner of the dormat, she discovered the jewel casket, put on the glittering ear-bohs and the soft seductive pearls and sang to them what might have been a respectable treatise by Mr. Bok on the propriety of a young, unmarried woman wearing such "scenery and effects" with post-prandial costume. And she met Faust with the cynical philosophy of Magda, who says, "it's always a tenor with us," and treated him with practical consideration and untumultuous, unenthralled, impassioned, hade him to her bower. And the devil gloated his Ha! Ha! Ha! Ha! for a white soul sullied.

But it was an easy going soul, that which Nordica found in Marguerite, and its whiteness was rather world-worn, and it went to its dechastening with excessive presence of mind, and Faust was as much sinned with as sinning.

All this may be very modern and very unneurotic and Nordica, no doubt, has her own opinion of Marguerite's temperature, which is not wholly to the comfort of rejuvenated Dr. Faustus, or closely faithful to Goethe, or illuminative of Gounod's score, or enchanting to an audience.

It was said to me in extenuation by several sorrowful musicians, that it was impossible to gauge a singer's ability in the limited opportunity offered by a single act of an opera, but even then I could not get it through my head how two hours more of an un-Gounodian and unromantic Marguerite was going to make her any better; particularly when a few moments before the same singer had sung the audience into frenzied quivers with Erkel's Erszabeth aria. It was this tempest of Hungarian melodrama that made the night Nordica's—this and the two encore songs which followed it. Otherwise the night was anybody's—even poor, old Scalchi's; for Scalchi poured her depleted hest into everything she sang. And when Nordica clicked her heel before the flaming tour de force which ended the Magyar aria, and the wonderful notes welled out from her tense open throat, like everyone's else in the Baldwin, my chair grew too small for my enthusiasm. I wanted plenty of room and the moral courage to swing my hat. In the fever of that moment I would have sworn she could conquer anything—anything!—from tuberculous Violetta to Trilby's Chopin Impromptu. But she drew the line easily and swiftly at Marguerite.

Nordica is a great singer, a fabulous singer in her own dramatic lines—and they are not narrow lines, either, withal they exclude Marguerite, for she sang "When Love is Kind" with fragile fancy, giving it the life, color and humor of a comedy in miniature, and she sang a lullaby, by Luckstone, with a kiss and a caress, and a motherly pat in every tone. I am not taking the standard of Miss

Any-old-person's hallad recital when I say Nordica sang these little songs exquisitely—she made creations of them. There was a picture and a story in each, and her enunciation was a lesson in English.

Peter Robertson, I see by several morning papers, says that Scalchi's "Annie Laurie" is a lesson in Scotch. Now that I think of it the hurr did come out in rich, wide plaids; and, unless sentimentality seizes me—for I, too, have a heartspot with Scalchi written on it in indelible italics, which might impair my truth and make me hanal, I must begin and end my eulogy by echoing clansman Robertson. Scalchi's Scotch is superb. Still, a whole square, three deep, of fuzzy-kneed Highlanders, accompanied by four hands of haggpipes, and Ian McLaren and James Barrie and a glossary to boot, cannot make me forget the time when Scalchi could sing—sing till you thrilled to the marrow with richness of it, the great, big, round perfection of it. And of this voice, which belonged to history years ago, what is left? Not enough full notes to buy May Yohe a new lordling. The upper tones are broken and blared, the lower are husky, timberless and coughsome; Yes; the method is still there; but method is madness when it attempts to gild an old and tarnished voice.

Just judging from appearances, and names and their significance, I should have take Berthald for Dempsey. He looks more that way. But Mr. Berthald is by no means a had man if you judge him with your ears. He has a somewhat obscure but resourceful tenor and he made a great deal more out of the Prize Song from Die Meistersinger than the orchestra evidently intended he should; and he shared his encore with the composer, which was tactful in more ways than one, for I fear he would be a hit ponderous in ballads. And with this exception encores meant hallads every time Monday night. I haven't the least idea why. Mr. Dempsey sang that touching temperance poem "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" in a pure steadfast way, which suited that song much better than the same pure steadfast way did Mephisto's music.

The orchestra, composed of Mr. August Hinrichs and his musical union friends, and under the direction of Luckstone, experienced perhaps less unhappy accidents than usually attend this sort of an orchestra on this sort of an occasion.

The audience was a swollen success.

Thursday was Scalchi's night, so far as Trovatore was concerned, and, if it comes down to five distinctions, Scalchi's eveu in the concert half of the programme. Nordica sang "Dich Theure Halle," from Tannhauser, in drawing-room spirit. Of course one cannot demand atmosphere and intense Germanism amid the rigor of concert surroundings and with a frugal piano accompaniment, but Nordica achieved such fine fury, such almost Amazonian passion in the Magyar aria Tuesday night, that we expected more than a Vere de Vere reading of the Wagner. However, she atoned handsomely with three encores, Arne's "Where the Bee Sucks," Foerster's "Ich liebe dich," and "Robin Adair," all sung imaginatively and sympathetically. And I wondered again over the singular contradictions of this musical temperament, which can woo such sweet romance from simple hallads and fail so lamentably in Marguerite. No one expected a great Leonora of Nordica, and no one was surprised. She patronized Verdi as a funny old-timer who dealt in fancy work tragedies to the beat of waltzful triplet strings. Not so with Scalchi, who is no modern, and whose heart is true to the trustful old music of a hyegone day. Scalchi did her noble hest; she fought time and nature, and occasionally a big broad note surged out and swept us back to the other days, when Wagner was an upstart and Verdi king, and Scalchi the contralto of the world.

I would not advise you to take a Three Dollar mood to the Columbia. The Devil's Auction is not worth it. After four furious acts of dances, songs and gags, harassed by decadent scenery from the year 1, and the most villainously played music I have ever heard from any orchestra in any place, I left the theatre with hut two moving mements within recall. The first was Miss Mayo's singing of a doctored and diluted version of "The New Bully," in which she showed such begrudged zeal, such rapt grit and enterprise, that I wondered how she ever found her way into this one-night-stand show business, instead of taking the broad and shiny path of vaudeville, where, by every note and smile and gesture, she belongs. There is not a woman at the Orpheum, nor has there been in many moons, who could light the gas for Mamie Mayo. In the other bright moment occurred a pair of old-fashioned pantalettes—the kind grandmother used to make. This spectacular garment, charged with lively human freight, and aimed plural end at the audience, came to be wedged in a car window during "The Trials of the Trolley." Many persons present pronounced it the chief attraction of the evening, and I understand the management relies upon this feature as one of the principal drawers.

Mr. Philip Hastings, who is known to the local authorities in connection with "He Ain't In It," "Guess Again," and other songs which disturbed the peace and incited riot in '90 and '91, and to dramatic critics by his skill at adjective and fluent circulation of the advance notice, is one of the new attractions at the Orpheum. Mr. Hastings is not to be seen upon the stage. Owing to the moon-moon of Mr. Moore, who is balancing his experience with the fame and fortune of the queen of scandal, Mrs. Dimond (now about to elevate the stage), Mr. Hastings is retained by the Orpheum management in the capacity of prose-poet and press agent. On the other side of the lights the Frauzes, a family of seven men, women and boy acrobats, do an absorbing turn. John Wilson and Bertha Waring accomplish some capital gags, and Binns and Binns, the well-remembered musical comedians, have secured a new lease of Orpheum favor. ASHTON STEVENS.

A wonderful actress in a wonderful play opens at the Baldwin Monday night.—Modjeska in Magda. This play and player are linked in dramatic history. It was Modjeska's acting of Magda that established this grim, absorbing play in the Saxon and Latin tongues. Berhardt and Duse have each paid tribute to Suderman's master creation, and many who have seen the three actresses in the part, give the preference to Modjeska. Joseph Howarth, an actor of big reputation, heads the supporting company. The stage direction is in the hands of George Osbourne. Magda is the bill until Saturday night, when Mary Stuart will be presented.

The Tivoli will also launch a big production on Saturday night—Aladdin, which George Lask, Ferris Hartman, and their associate librettists, composers and compilers, have been brewing for some months. The Tivoli is getting to be very timely in the matter of spectacular pieces. Jack and the Beanstalk opened almost instantaneously with the big New York holiday show, and now Aladdin comes just as the big pantomime by that name is making a sensation at Drury Lane, London. During the week, until Saturday, Maritana will be sung.

Bessie Clayton, who has been singing and dancing with the Trip to Chinatown company in Australia, and Alcide Capitaine, an aerial wonder from Italy, are the new cards for the Orpheum. Mr. Hastings says that the crowned heads and press of Europe have pronounced Miss Capitaine "the perfect woman," because her remarkable muscular development is completely concealed by her superb physical beauty. Johnnies, take warning!

Nordica will give an extra concert on Sunday night, and sing again the famous Erszebeth aria. The quartette from Rigoletto concludes the programme. The matinee to-day will bring out the famous closing scene to Siegfried; Nordica as the demi-goddess, Brunhilde.

The town is full of musical enthusiasm, and subscriptions are coming in handsomely for the new Symphony Society. A new symphony by Dr. Dvorak is promised for the opening concert.

Guilo Minetti, violinist, Roderick Herold, pianist, and Miss M. Genevieve Maroney, soprano, will assist Hugo Herold in his song recital at Golden Gate Hall Jan. 29th.

THERE are black sheep in every flock, there are scrubs in every profession, there are unworthy and indecent men on every block we travel. The Examiner has had for years upon its staff a man in a position of trust who is today, and has been for years, an object of the dislike and contempt of every honest minded journalist in the State. We refer to "Andy," now familiarly known as "Long Green" Lawrence. This person, utterly destitute of literary ability, a gutter-snipe in the most extreme sense of the word, a conspirator and lick-spittle, a petty tyrant where tyranny could assume the form of extortion, has, by some incomprehensible luck, and for some incomprehensible reason, been retained by Mr. Hearst as one of the guiding lights of his paper. A light to guide to what, a power to control what, an influence to shape what? There can be but one reply. The light that "Long Green" Lawrence shows is the lantern that guides to the sewers, the power is to tear open the most sacred and cherished secrets of families, the influence to help destroy innocent men and women by garbling the incidents of their private lives, to distort circumstances with which the public have absolutely no concern, although the attempt is made to excite their morbid interest in this wholesale hutchery of character.

How long shall men like "Long Green" Lawrence be permitted to endure in this community? Shall this hired assassin of right and morality place his foul hand, unrestrained, upon those things which decent people demand shall be held sacred? He stands alone in the profession as a pestilential whelp to whom even the sneaking body-guard that surrounds him pay reverence with tongues in cheek. Bluff, hearty Tom Williams, the Examiner's busi-ness manager, communicates his disgust to his cuspidor when "Long Green" Lawrence crosses the threshold of the Market street office. He is despised and hated, but still he maintains his position by that inexplicable prompting which oftentimes leads men of wealth to employ the vilest instruments to carry out their designs.

During all this fellow's career on the Examiner there is not a good word to be said about him. His associates have been of the lowest, and he has been shunned by the gentlemen on his paper, who have persistently sneered at his practices, and denounced his vice. That such an individual should not alone possess a shadow of authority, but that he should be tolerated at all, is an argument in favor of the all-enduring patience of this community. We are accused of supporting a corrupt and demoralizing press, and how can we dare refute the assertion when such characters as "Long Green" Lawrence are mentioned as journalists, even though their identification with every disreputable job, upon which now and then light is shed, is established. If William Hearst is not lost to all sense of decency he will retire this ex-peanut butcher to obscurity, and let him tumble naturally into the meshes of the law.

The artists are combining to make a move in a business direction. And it is high time. The painting of pictures is a delightful and aesthetic amusement, but one cannot live on the odors of the studio, and the stomach is so anatomically confined that it only enjoys art by its results. Now, the Art Association, while an excellent institution for education in art, and for the support of a few teachers, does not put a dime into the pockets of the majority of the Brethren of the Brush. It is hard times with the artists, for the picture buyer is a melancholy infrequency. Now an informal meeting was held at the club a few evenings ago, and the plan of a combine outlined. In the first place, the chairman, president, director, or whatever his title may be of this movement, must not be an artist. The necessity for this is evident to all who have had the entrée of the studios. In the next place, a sort of monthly drawing, an Art Union scheme for which a certain number of tickets might be issued, the proceeds to be divided among the contributing artists. This should also take the form of an entertainment, music, songs, short acts, etc., winding up with a Spanish supper under the direction of that inimitable Castilian chef, Charles Rollo Peters, for whose impressions of Monterey scenery a box car is now loading at the ancient capital. Properly and harmoniously managed, a scheme of this nature would give each meritorious and industrious artist an assured monthly income, and keep the wolf, not only from the door, but in the next block.

Quite a clever story is told on one of our last season's brides, which caused a great deal of merriment among her circle. This young matron in question, belonging as she does to the order of nouveau riche, is ever desirous of impressing upon others her own importance and social standing, and considers New York the home of American aristocracy. At one of our recent social functions, she met a young lady from Washington, who is spending the winter on this coast. To the great annoyance of this stranger, the madam immediately cultivated her, and insisted whenever they met on presenting her as "her friend Miss D— from New York." Miss D—, wishing to put a stop to such proceedings, decided upon a way most quiet and effectual. The occasion soon presented itself at a very large tea given on Van Ness avenue. Our Washington friend, on entering the drawing-room, was soon espied by our Madame Nouveau Riche, who advanced most graciously, exclaiming so all might hear: "Ah! My friend Miss D—, from New York."

Imagine the horror depicted on Madame's countenance when Miss D— replied in a placid and gentle tone:

"Yes—from the Bowery!"

A general titter pervaded the vast assemblage. It is superfluous to say that the annoyance was removed.

Harry Dimond laments the aggressiveness of the new woman, whose rampant actions, he believes, are forcing the lords of creation into positions of secondary importance. Finding it necessary to give some personal instructions at the French laundry he patronizes, he sought the ostensible proprietor, but was by him referred to madame. Dimond speedily found that the woman was unmistakably the head of both family and business. He made some cynical comment upon this condition, to which the woman readily assented.

"My husband, he not very good for busi-ness," she explained. "But," she added with a glow of pardonable pride, "he is a fine laundress!"

There is no doubt but William Greer Harrison will leave California in a few months to make his permanent residence in the East. Mr. Harrison will be a loss to the literary and artistic life of San Francisco. He has done more for poor painters and writers in this city than will ever transpire, and by his indomitable energy and encouragement, has set many a weak vessel on its way from stormy to smooth waters. His family will remain in Europe for two years, and he will attend to the interests of the Thames and Mersey Company in New York or Chicago. The Bohemian Club will miss him sorely, for he was ever foremost in all the big things the club essayed, and was untiring in his efforts to promote them.

A genius who lives on Montgomery avenue has done as much for his day and generation in his line as Edison. He has invented a Welsh rarebit which will not clog. There is nothing which provokes keener competition among the amateur cooks of the clubs than the comparative excellence of their rarebit. But this Faraday of the kitchen has succeeded in mixing the ingredients into a soluble paste, which awaits only heat, toast and spoon. Even Peter Robertson, who has a larger quantity of Welsh rarebit scalps to his score than any man on earth, will acknowledge the quality of this new breed.

The latest and most elegant things in gent's furnishing goods are to be had of John W. Carmany, 25 Kearny St.

Honorable Paul Neumann of Honolulu has returned from Europe, and is much improved by his trip. No San Franciscan ever made Honolulu his home who was more pleased with that tropical clime than the genial Paul. His career there has been a success from the start, under all administrations. But in those days, when Paul first went to the Islands, there were rapid changes in the ministry. During Premier Gibson's administration, Mr. Neumann was appointed Attorney-General, and as such, took a seat in the Cabinet. Now, the uniform of a Cabinet officer in Honolulu during the kingdom was extremely elaborate and expensive; in fact, a perfect razzle-dazzle of gold lace. Mr. Neumann sent on to Paris for his ministerial costume. The weeks rolled on, and the affairs of the Government grew more and more unsettled. Battling winds and unkind ocean currents detained the good ship which was bearing the ministerial splendor to Honolulu. On the very day the ship was sighted off Diamond Head, a vote of want of confidence in the Government was passed, and just as Mr. Neumann's sword and uniform was put on the wharf, that diplomat surrendered his portfolio. The uniform still hangs in Mr. Neumann's closet in Honolulu, a gorgeous monument to the splendors of a departed kingdom.

At the Cosmos Club, many of the members with speculative tendencies indulge in frequent games of poker, and every Tuesday evening the game is given such full swing that no pretense at discontinuing play is made until daylight. One of the weekly all-night devotees is Charlie Bandman. The last time he played, he had varying luck, at one stage of the game possessing almost all the chips on the table, but before the termination of play losing all his money on a flush. No phase of the game escapes the vigilance of the servants in attendance, and a player's luck is quickly communicated from hall to kitchen. When Bandman, feeling poor and hungry, concluded it was time to go to business on Wednesday, he decided he would first have breakfast at the club, and entering the dining room, ordered a plate of hot cakes as a solace to his simple appetite and in keeping with his diminished purse. He tried to be philosophical over his losses, but he was hardly prepared to overhear the waiter paraphrase his order for hot cakes at the door: "A stack of whites for Mr. Bandman," was the intelligent commentary on the condition of the poker player's exchequer.

John Luther, the capitalist, and John Bourne, the caller of the stock board, are the Heavenly Twins of the Bohemian Club. Those two giddy fellows, both of whom have passed the seventy-year notch, have more fun in their way than the friskiest kid in the club. Not that their way is a quiet, demure way by any means. When the Reformer wishes the other John to refresh himself, he does not say in a piping treble: "Come, my dear old fellow, and let us take off the chill"; but he gives him a thump in the ribs that would stagger a lightweight, and sings out in a voice that a boatswain might be proud of. "Here, you young fellow, I can see thirst in your eye." When Uncle George Bromley joins the group things just hum. In fact, it keeps the directors busy restraining those young hoods from playing leap-frog in the social room.

THAT President A. W. Foster of the San Francisco and North Pacific Railroad would come out the victor in his fight against Sidney V. Smith, was to be expected, notwithstanding the decision of so eminent a jurist as Judge Angelotti of Marin County. This decision has now been reversed by the Supreme Court, which held with President Foster that Mr. Smith was not a director of the railroad. Seeing that the present Directors and Mr. Foster all work harmoniously for the company's and the stockholders' interests, good times for all concerned may be anticipated.

The Discovery of the North Pole.

By Charles P. Nettleton

(From the New York King, September 12, 1906)

THE announcement ten days ago of the greatest discovery of modern times naturally created profound interest, not to say excitement, throughout the civilized world. It is matter for congratulation that this marvellous achievement was made by Americans, or rather by an American, as one man alone planned the feat, and today The King is enabled to give its readers the first published particulars of the methods employed by the wealthy and now famous Prof. John B. Fairchild in his most brilliant and successful attempt to reach the North Pole. At great expense the following special interview with the Professor has been cabled us:

HONNINGVAAG, NORWAY, September 11, 1906.

The Discoverer of the North Pole, Prof. J. B. Fairchild, of New Haven, Connecticut, U. S. A., was found by me after some trouble, and the following is a full account of my interview with him. As your regular correspondent cabled, the Professor was obliged to anchor his steamer, the North Pole, in a little fiord, or inlet, a few miles south of Hammerfest, and make some slight repairs on her before proceeding to the United States. The whaling-vessel which spoke the North Pole and brought us the first news of the discovery gave such vague directions for finding her that I cruised about fruitlessly for three days, and the representatives of the other papers probably are still angrily peering round the inlets in that quarter.

Yesterday at dawn, while searching the extreme end of our twenty-eighth fiord, we found the North Pole close at hand. In seeking a safe harbor for a few days the captain had concealed the ship pretty effectually. In half an hour I was on board and congratulating Prof. Fairchild and his companions, whose names you have already. We all went down to the cabin, where I told my business.

The Professor is a quiet, genial, tall blonde Yankee, with large and frank but piercing eyes, and nervous to a degree, but thoroughly self-controlled. He looks capable of running a college or capturing a crew of pirates.

It had not escaped me that the North Pole was a large but, so far as I could see, very ordinary-looking steamer, of 2,000 or 3,000 tons. I noticed, however, that she seemed to be iron-clad, but saw nothing remarkable in that fact. In answer to my many questions the Professor or his able associates spoke as follows:

"No, we did not find an open Polar Sea, as some men have rather foolishly insisted would be the case: the path to the Pole is through hundreds of miles of solid ice. Neither did we leave the ship and travel over the ice. This ship you are on at this moment, my friend, steamed through the ice and remained for five days and five nights directly over that point at the northern extremity of the earth commonly called its axis, or the North Pole. Your eyes open! Well, there are 14 other men on board besides the crew of 43, who can bear witness to the fact as well as I, but before you leave us we will demonstrate the statement to be a scientific possibility." He paused, then added, "And if you don't admit it we will take you up there and leave you there."

I gazed half-incredulously at the other gentlemen. They nodded solemnly, or smiled superiorly, and one of them unlocked a drawer in a cabinet and took out a tiny bottle of water, which lay with many others on cotton-batting. Putting it in my hand he remarked quietly, "North Pole water, lately ice. Keep it." While thanking him I mentally resolved to be very meek and mild, in face of the Professor's awful threat. He continued:

"The many attempts to reach the Pole in the regular manner by travelling over the ice and establishing supply stations or making cache along the route, long ago I felt to be folly and almost crime. The cold weather, the distance, the amount of supplies to be taken, uncertainties connected with the ice,—all these and other things precluded, to my mind, the bare possibility of ever reaching the Pole in that way. To travel to it through the air seemed for a time more feasible, but when the three balloon attempts we all know about had for one reason or another failed utterly, it seemed folly to try again in that way.

"About the time the first balloon attempt was made, in 1896, I determined to deliberately think out an original plan by which I could succeed. Five years ago the right idea came to me. I gave four years and a half to the work of preparation, and selection of my comrades, all of whom were pledged to secrecy, and on June 1st of this year we cleared from New York City.

"My idea?" The Professor smiled broadly, and then burst into a laugh.

"Why, man, it is simplicity itself! The only wonder is that no man had thought of it before. To put all in a sentence, I had a steamer built to order after my own plans, plated her with three-inch steel on the outside up to within three feet of the rail, or taffrail, as it is sometimes called, placed within her a powerful engine and electric dynamo combined, and then conveyed the electricity to the steel plate on the outside of the vessel. The immensely powerful current we were able to generate simply melted the ice we wanted to pass through, and that's all there is to it."

I gasped in amazement. In theory, the idea seemed as though it might be perfect. In practice—well, they said it had worked, so there was nothing for me to say. But that was not by any means "all there was to it," as he modestly expressed it, and in reply to further questions the Professor went on, speaking first of his vessel.

"My steamer is 240 feet long, of 2,300 tons register, and is fitted out with engines 3,000 horse-power, slightly modified to meet the peculiarities of the fuel we used. I should say also that the outside steel plate conducting the electricity is six inches from the frame of the vessel, the space between being packed with asbestos.

"You are right: a most powerful current of the so-called fluid, electricity, was necessary in order to melt the thick ice sufficiently rapidly for us to make any headway. I will not go into details about the engine-dynamo further than to say it is what is called a vertical quadruple expansion engine, marine type, of 2,500 H. P.,—actual, not nominal,—and carries a pair of 800 kilo-watt dynamos supplying together about 13,000 amperes; its dimensions are 26x18 feet by 25 feet high. I can assure you it is a magnificent piece of machinery. You must take a look at it before you leave us.

"No, it is never the custom to have the dynamo run by the same engines that propel the ship, for various reasons, chief of which is that it would be difficult to properly operate the dynamo when it was desired to do so without at the same time running the vessel.

"In planning our course we followed very nearly in the track of the Greely Expedition, of 1882; Lieut. Lockwood, of that party, on May 13, 1882, reached latitude 83° 24', or a point distant from the Pole 396 geographical miles, equal to 458 statute miles. Twice since then have men approached closer to the Pole: the whaling vessel Newport in 1893, and Prof. Nansen and party in 1896. But we ignored their routes altogether.

"Professor Greely and his party travelled for many miles over the ice. We encountered ice about 60 statute miles south of the extremest northern point he reached, making it necessary for us to traverse over 500 miles of solid ice. As our speed averaged nearly one mile per hour—pretty fair travelling, too, under the circumstances!—it took us five days of twenty four hours to come to the jumping off point. On the way back we have taken it slower.

"We found no open water to speak of and but little thin or broken ice; it was one nearly level field of solid glistening ice, the glare from which of course compelled us to wear very dark glasses. Much if not most of the time there was ice beneath us, and so we were constantly in an ever-shifting shallow little lagoon of water extending one foot or so on all sides and beneath the vessel. We wasted no energy in cutting a wide swath.

"Did the electricity not affect the compass? No; why should it? It is only magnetism which makes the compass deviate, though if that instrument were held near a dynamo or very close to a live wire it would doubtless be deranged temporarily. But our compass scared us once, for a few moments! Because it always points north, what would you expect it to do on reaching the extremest northern point of our sphere? Well, our instrument seemed drunk, or bewildered, until Dr. Goodman stood it on its head, so to speak, when all was serene again. There's a problem for us to solve!

"The cold was something terrible, awful, unspeakable. It was simply beyond words. For days our spirit-thermometers registered—or did not vary more than two degrees from—112 degrees below zero Fahrenheit. But cold weather we had come prepared for, and I am glad to say that not one of our party of 58 was severely frozen in any part. So much for having given months of thought to preparing for every contingency.

"We lost one man by accident, it is true, but that occurred through his own carelessness. You must know that Polar bears—large, white, beautiful—sometimes came very near the ship. Desiring to take hack with us a few of their magnificent skins, we one day took a hundred yards of heavily-insulated wire, exposed a foot of one end, attached the other to the dynamo and sallied forth. While some of us were permitting a bear to chew the live end, which he did for about one second, one of the crew stole up behind the animal and put his hand on him before his intention occurred to us, or before we could jerk away the wire. Well, that's all! I should say that while we have intelligent men for a crew, every man had been impressively and repeatedly warned not to run the slightest risk whatsoever of drawing a charge of the terrific amount of electricity on board. Even we ourselves, experienced scientists, kept a look-out for one another and took no offence at a word of caution. Of course the wire that caused the man's death could convey but a small part of the 400,000 volts generated by the dynamo, but still it was a fearful charge and it did its work in a moment.

"A possible source of peril and the one I had feared almost above all others was the crashing down on our ship of some overtowering iceberg. I feared that in making our way through the enormously thick ice and among the ill-shapen mountains of it we must expect to encounter, we might undermine or in some way precipitate upon us a mass capable a thousand times over of hurrying us out of sight. But we encountered few icebergs except at the shore, so to speak. Moreover, we discovered something which astonished us and relieved us from all fear on that score, something which only experience could have even suggested. This is that as the ship left the open water and gradually began to force her way through the ice she was raised by the water she had melted above the level of the sea, until we sailed over and through the plateau of ice as we would through any other sea. This process was gradual, but the very fact that we were surrounded by only a little water, which froze again instantly as we went on, aided us much, if indeed it does not account for the experience. To express it in other words, at times the ship simply travelled up-hill and down, although of course at a very slight angle only. Still, we got there! We did not have specially smooth sailing, but we managed to travel on and we avoided colliding with any suspicious iceberg.

"When did we reach the Pole? On July 28th. The next party that goes up there will find a veritable pole of heavy wood. At the foot of it we left a stout box containing certain papers, a box securely sealed and anchored. By the way, we surmounted that pole with a plate of thin steel bearing on one side a painted United States flag, and on the other the motto, 'Keep of the grass.'

The Professor rose to indicate that the interview was over. I asked him about the more scientific results of his great discovery, but he said good-humoredly that he and his companions must have more time in which to calculate and study before publishing them. Probably, also, they prefer to give those things to the expectant world over their own names.

But there was one point which had not been touched on, and such an important point that I urged the gentlemen to explain it. This was the motive power of the ship and dynamo. I knew that the North Pole could not have carried coal anywhere near sufficient for such a trip and such a purpose, and without a great deal of fuel of some kind they would never have dared to enter on the task of penetrating the icy and unfurnished regions of the Arctic Circle.

"No, we did not use coal," said the Professor. "When the leading idea of the whole business came to me, that of melting a path for the ship with electricity, it doubled and more than doubled the problem of supplying fuel for the engines. Then I set my wits to work in earnest. We could not use coal, or at least not in its ordinary form, as an easy calculation showed that for an eight months supply for the engines I purposed using I would have to carry 12,000 or 13,000 tons, an utter impossibility. I proposed running no risk of being caught empty-handed far from a coaling station.

"Now the loss of power from any engine using coal is great, amounting usually to 85 per cent. Even such engines as I should take, the very finest triple or quadruple expansion, on land or sea utilize not more than 25 per cent at the most, involving the loss of fully three quarters of the coal. This is a tremendous fact, but is well known to all engineers. It is true that the loss would be the same in portion no matter what was fed to the engines, but the point was that coal was too heavy and too hulky anyway. When both engines were running, our steamer would have demanded three or four tons per hour. To bring supply-vessels was totally out of the question.

"Inventors have applied themselves diligently to devising methods by which this loss of power might be saved, and these methods I investigated carefully. For one reason or another none of them satisfied me. I experimented myself a good deal, and not caring to give years to its study, I turned my thoughts into another channel.

"The greatest heat-producing article in nature is hydrogen gas. The calorific power of one pound of hydrogen burned under favorable conditions is sufficient to raise over 34,000 pounds of water from zero centigrade to one degree centigrade, or nearly the same as from 32 Fahrenheit to 34 F. In other words, and comparing it with coal, one pound of which yields about 8,000 thermal units, we know that one pound of hydrogen gas yields over 34,000 thermal units, or over four and one quarter times as much power as coal. Hydrogen gas I must certainly use.

"Now of all the four processes by which we chemists obtain that gas, not one yields it in an absolutely pure condition. I might have passed this point, however, but the best method chemists have so far used was inadequate to furnish more than an infinitesimal fraction of the vast amount necessary to propel the ship and run the dynamo. In short, I applied myself to the task of discovering a process by which I could obtain my gas from the compound always used—water—easily enough and in quantities sufficient for every purpose.

"I succeeded. Our motive power for both engines, therefore, has been drawn daily from the very water we passed through. We brought a little coal, about 3,000 tons, for use in emergencies, but have not touched it. Hydrogen gas is the calorific power which has enabled us to go to the North Pole. When we reach New Haven again I shall have the discovery of my process for obtaining that gas, also, to give to the world, and I think that in the near future hydrogen will take the place of coal in all large ships, manufactories, etc."

The interview was over. Before leaving, the engineer-in-chief showed me the interior workings of the ship, and explained certain points of great interest, such as the Professor's method of extracting hydrogen from the water, but this cablegram is already sufficiently lengthy.

The accident to the steamer will delay the party a few days only. They will then proceed at once to the United States, there to enjoy the fruits of Professor Fairchild's remarkable achievement, fruits which all the civilized nations of the globe will undoubtedly hasten to bestow on him, the more especially as his expedition did not need the usual rescuing.

A Book of the Week.* Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch's "Adventures in Criticism," a collection of papers from The Speaker (London), first attracted our attention as being written by one of the most brilliant of the younger Oxford writers, and next as being dedicated to an old Oxford friend. The well-printed volume contains nearly forty short essays on various literary topics. Some interesting remarks are found in the essay entitled "The Attitude of the Public Towards Letters," in which Mr. Quiller-Couch clearly points out the popular fallacy that the great Brain of the Public is the supreme judge of literature. Though, of course, it rests ultimately with the Public to buy, or refuse to buy, an author's works, immense popular success is a very poor and inadequate test of the merit of a writer. The general public, so far from being (as men who ought to know better sometimes tell it) an infallible judge of good literature, is not even a competent one. It is absurd to suppose that the man in the street forms a truer estimate of a book than the man of culture. The public, in so far as it entertains right views at all about books, derives them from that aristocracy of taste and intelligence which is nowhere a very numerous body. The average parson, the average professional man, the average commercial man, knows little or nothing of literary matters. Some books they can read, and many others they cannot, and there's an end to it. It is the cultured few who gradually impose their views on the many, and the general public is the ultimate judge only in the sense that it is the last to be convinced. Take a writer of such great popularity as the late R. L. Stevenson. Who first found him out? Were not men of taste twenty years ago reading "An Inland Voyage" with delight, and feeling that a new star had arisen in the literary firmament. And how many years ago is it since "Donkey Rides in the Cevennes" or "Memories and Portraits" were discovered by the great public? How few, comparatively, of the many-headed Demus have even yet found them? In "A Case of Book-stall Censorship" Mr. Quiller-Couch comments amusingly on Messrs. Eason & Son, a firm of booksellers who enjoy a monopoly of the bookstalls at the railway stations of Ireland, similar to that enjoyed by W. H. Smith & Son, at the railway stations of Great Britain. Messrs. Eason & Son refused to sell Grant Allen's "Woman Who Did" at any railway station in Ireland, considering that its tendency was towards immorality. While this conduct was unquestionably honest, it was erroneous, because it is not as literary critics and judges of what may, and what may not, be read that Messrs. Eason are doing business; their business is to supply such books as their customers ask for. A censorship of literature may be a good thing, but let its functions be exercised by a man chosen for his literary knowledge, and not by a book-vender, however honest and successful. Other papers deal with Henry Kingsley (the brother of Charles), Charles Reade, Robert Louis Stevenson, Hall Caine, Anthony Hope Hawkins, Frank R. Stockton, "Tribby," etc. Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch has an instinctive dislike (in which we heartily join him) of stories into which hypnotism and other pseudo-scientificisms are introduced, and asserts that Mr. du Maurier's "Tribby" won its immense popularity not because of, but in spite of, the hypnotism contained in it. He goes on to say that "Tribby" consists of two incompatible parts, one natural and the other supernatural, and that it is only the charm of the natural portion of the tale that carries the rest along; the hypnotic and scoundrelly machinations of Sven-gali being redeemed by the dramatic adventures of Tribby, Little Billee, Taffy, and the Laird, who win a warm place in all hearts.

*This story was awarded the third prize in a competition arranged by the Chicago Record. The title is a not very ingenious adaptation of the title of the well-known romance by Ouida, "Under Two Flags." The three national emblems are the American, the Cuban, and the Spanish. We find here the murderer, the shrewd detective, the superlatively beautiful and equally unprincipled woman, and the mysterious, dark, sombre, self-contained, invincible man, that are found in all such stories. The story is a story, and nothing more; it has not a trace of literary quality; there is no attempt at characterization; all the men and women speak alike; that is, just as the New York newspaper-man, who is a leading feature of the story, and his confères speak. There are adventures, hair's-breadth escapes, and complications of all kinds, spun out somewhat interminably. Yet, to our thinking, the story, poor as it is, is better than the hemuddled tale to which the first prize in this queer contest was awarded; we have managed to read "Under Three Flags" through; the story which won the highest award beat us entirely; to borrow a phrase from the race-track, we could not last the distance.

*"Under Three Flags: A Story of Mystery," by B. L. Taylor and A. T. Thoits. Published by Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago and New York. 1896.

George W. Cable, the well-known writer, edits a monthly literary magazine, entitled "The Symposium." It is published at Northampton, Mass., is of moderate bulk, but printed on good paper, and has good pictures. In the December issue, Clifton Johnson, who displays great taste and skill in the illustration of books by photographs, has an article on "The Land of Lorna Doon," with four illustrations from his own photographs. An article by Mr. Cable on J. M. Barrie is adorned with a portrait of Mrs. Barrie. The magazine contains several stories and poems, and five departments, the latter under the titles of "Thoughts and Views," "In the Foreground," "Home and Neighbor," "In the Reading World," and "Tail-pieces." The periodical advocates the formation of Home-Culture clubs, and offers many advantages to those who desire to borrow books from the circulating library connected with the magazine. Though we think that "home culture" should mean the cultivation of homes, just as horticulture means the cultivation of gardens, or pisciculture the breeding of fish, yet we are willing to suppose that it is intended to mean the cultivation of the minds of the various members of the family.

"A Great Hotel," which appears in the February Scribner's as the second article on "The Conduct of Great Businesses," gives some astounding facts as to this modern development of one of the oldest businesses in the world. There are as many employees in a great hotel as there are guests; there is a man whose whole duty it is to wind clocks; one head waiter in a great hotel owns a yacht and a summer residence; and hotels have their private blacksmith and paint shops. C. D. Gibson's great series of London pictures, which begin to appear in this number, is accompanied with his own notes and impressions, which show him to be a bright, crisp, and observant writer. The pictures present entirely new types from London streets.

On Tuesday evening, January 12th, Mr. J. W. Laing, M. A., of Oxford, and a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, delivered a lecture at Union Square Hall on his recent explorations in Vancouver Island, illustrated by many fine photographs. The Rev. W. W. Bolton gave an amusing narrative of his experiences on the same trip. The lecture was before the Geographical Society of the Pacific, and was very well attended. Next evening, at Pioneers' Hall, Mr. Laing delivered a lecture, illustrated with fine stereopticon views, on India, where he was formerly Head Master of the college founded by Lord Mayo for the education of the sons of the Maharajahs. This was well received by the large audience.

Professor Howison of the State University's recent address before the California Teachers' Association in San Jose, on "Interest and Character as Educational Motives," will be published in pamphlet form by William Doxey; as also will the report, by Dr. Harris, the United States Commissioner of Education, and Professor Howison, of a discussion on the rational interpretation of Christianity, at the conference of Presbyterian ministers held on December 21st of last year. At Easter, Mr. Doxey will issue a collection of the poems of Clareuce F. Urmy, a Californian whose verse has won much favor with magazine editors.

In the Christmas issue of the Bookman a strange statement is made in a note upon Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie's "Essays on Nature and Culture." It is to this effect: "The volume of the work has been increased one-half, so that instead of the original twelve essays we have now twenty-four in the final shape which the book has taken." The writer of this may be a fair literary critic, but he is certainly a weak arithmetician. Twelve "increased one-half" is eighteen; twelve raised to twenty-four is doubled, a book which originally contained twelve essays, but now contains twenty-four, has in it twice as much matter as it originally had; in other words, it is as large again as it was before. We should like to propound to the Bookman's man the old problem: If a herring-and-a-half cost a cent-and-a-half, what is the price per dozen? If he mastered that, we would then try him with this: If a hen-and-a-half lay an egg-and-a-half in a day-and-a-half, how many eggs will six hens lay in seven days? We should be willing to lay two to one on the problem.

The Academy, one of London's most serious literary periodicals, has lately adopted a novel manner of reviewing books for boys. The Bookman gives the following example of the new school of criticism: "Harold the Norseman" is simply a ripping story about Harold Haardraada, King of Norway, who was bowled out at last by the other Harold at the Batt'e of Stamford Bridge with Tostig, who was a bit of a bouncer. The story is just as good as history, because the writer has taken it from the old poet Johnnies. This book tells you all about the Vikings, how they lived, and hunted, and fought; and you feel that it is all real, because the writer has taken it all from the chaps who saw it done." This, while decidedly entertaining, is scarcely in conformity with one's preconceived ideas of so learned a weekly as the Academy.

A. Schilling & Co. have issued a neat little book of twenty-eight pages, with the seductive title, "Money-making." Therein they offer many suggestions to those who would make money by advertising, setting forth what good advertising is, and what it is not. "Advertising is not antics; not mere show of signs; not dirt; not a lot of vulgar and unpleasant things. It is what you like to see in other stores." Frankness, honesty, courtesy, and several other good, old-fashioned, but (we had feared) rather out-of-date virtues are recommended to him who would retail successfully; and samples of the signs prepared by Messrs. Schilling for use by grocers are given, to aid them in selecting those best suited to the requirements of their business.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

ONE of the most picturesque sights of the city is the old fort at Fort Point, which formerly guarded the entrance to the harbor, from the Golden Gate. The fort, although still in fair repair, is no longer used for defensive purposes, as more modern fortifications have been constructed in the immediate vicinity.

THE determination of Mr. Amadée Joullin to devote much of his time and attention to Indian studies is most praiseworthy, and will give that artist a larger field wherein to display his capabilities. A canvass just completed, called "Gone," is the first of this new series, and shows that he can treat such studies with the same breadth and felicity he puts in his landscape work. We shall look forward to his future work with pleasure, knowing that it will in no wise fall short of our expectations.

AT the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Spring Valley Water Works Company, the following directors, all members of the old board, were re-elected: Charles Webb Howard, A. H. Payson, G. W. Beaver, S. C. Bigelow, Charles R. Bishop, A. Borel, H. S. King. The reports submitted were most satisfactory, and show the affairs of the company to be in most excellent condition.

A Fifth Wheel To a Coach.

The many who hold the so-called Mining Bureau in disfavor as a parasitical outgrowth on the body politic, and a machine run in the interests of a clique, could adduce no better argument for its abolishment than the recent report which, in regard to practical utility, would be more aptly entitled a Mining Directory. It marks the latest and most pronounced stage of degeneracy in an institution which is now little more than a free advertising agency for the makers and inventors of mining machinery; of processes for the manipulation of ores, and personal friends of the powers that be. To appreciate the merits of this literary effort, evolved at the expense of $25,000 of public money, the reader will require a library of hack volumes at hand for reference. The hooks and accumulation of mining data should be turned over to the State University as a nucleus for a School of Mines, which would reflect some credit upon the community at least, and make some return for the money expended in its support. The museum, too, could be placed to much better advantage either in the Park or with the Academy of Sciences, which can boast of one equally as interesting, if not more so. The fact that the most prominent mine owners of the State refused to grant admission to representatives of the Bureau is noted, and perhaps may furnish its supporters with ammunition for a battle in behalf of the official recommendation that Czar-like powers be given the institution by adding mining inspectorship to the duties of State Mineralogist. What the Legislature ought to do, provided it does not wipe the Bureau out of existence, is to make it imperative that whoever is selected to fill the position of chief of the Bureau should possess a scientific as well as a practical training in the profession, and furthermore, that he should devote his sole time to the duties for which he is paid. Men engaged in operating mines of their own, and in other enterprises which take up their time, have no business at the head of a public department, and it should not be permitted.

Rigging the Foreign Market.

Failing the individual possessed of the wealth necessary to purchase their wares at inflated prices, the scheming purveyors for mining markets abroad have adopted a new and simpler method to fill their pockets. The public purse is now sought. Legitimate mining investments, on a moderate scale of profits in the way of a commission on sales, do not suit these manipulators, a grade or two removed in the social scale above the itinerant "pea and thimble" expert and "sure-thing" fakirs. They are on the look-out for some old shell with a record, which can be hurried up to pass examination from some purchasable scoundrel labeled mining engineer, hogus like the rest of the outfit. Equipped with a mine (?) of this description, the next step is to bring a company out in London or elsewhere with high-sounding name, prospectus full of glittering certainties in the way of profit on the investment, and a "guinea-pig" directory. Men who see through the rascally scheme, with power to stop it in the initial stages, are too venal or cowardly to interfere, and the game is played, the manipulators cleaning up their ill-gotten gain before the collapse comes. In the case of California properties, as a rule, the mine owner cannot be held responsible. He rarely receives what his mine is worth. Its value is gauged very closely, with no allowances made in dealing with him. The juggling is done at the other end, where the profit is turned, should the scaly transaction succeed, to be shared in by confederates who assisted here. That the latter-day type of Sir Mulberry Hawke does not always get off scot free is evident from the investigation now proceeding in London over a scheme of the kind, which is likely to end in the conviction of one or more of the Directors. It has already been developed that the real vendor or promoter had used fictitious names in application for shares, and had bought shares in the market in the names of other people to keep up the price. One of the Directors also admitted that an understanding existed between himself and the promoter, who was largely indebted to him, that the latter should give him half the profits when the company came out. This is a fair sample of what is going on, to the ultimate detriment of the business. It is some satisfaction to know, however, that money is not pouring in from the public so freely as these robbers might desire, and absolute failure has attended not a few of their schemes.

A Deplorable Mining Mishap.

The disaster which has overtaken the Thistle Mining Company by the flooding of its mines in Plumas, is a very regrettable affair. Without the slightest warning the water broke in, while driving one of the gangways up stream without the slightest appearance of moisture in the gravel, not even affording time to ascertain whether its source was from the gravel or bed rock. If from the former the pumps will, it is believed, eventually drain the mine, but if from the latter, the only salvation for the company lies in a tunnel, which will take a long time and much money. Otherwise the mine will have to be abandoned. The company was never doing better than when the water broke in and stopped work. The mine, which has been in operation for four years past, in charge of Mr. C. B. Wingate, was a credit to its management, and one which could be pointed out as a representative and successful investment of British capital in California. It is hoped that the water will eventually be mastered and work resumed on the property.

The Pine-Street Market.

The bear brokers and "chipping" fraternity on Pine street were treated to a surprise during the week, in the form of an upheaval in prices, which sent Chollar up to $1 40, the other north-end and middle shares showing a proportionate advance. Unfortunately, the movement was short-lived, and some of the stocks dropped suddenly back to the starting point almost faster than they went up. Subsequently, a streak of high-grade ore, cut on the 1550 level of Con.-Cal.-Virginia, helped to stiffen matters up and enthuse dealers to the point of increasing their holdings. When the Nevada Legislature meets, it is expected that it will assist the American Flat drainage scheme to some extent, and then the temper of local investors will be tested in the matter of support. If they take kindly to the scheme, some lively times may be expected on the street.

Production of Precious Metals.

Wells, Fargo & Co.'s annual report, compiled by President J. J. Valentine, of precious metals produced in the States and Territories west of the Missouri River (including British Columbia) during 1896, shows in the aggregate: Gold, $54,399,242; silver, $35,784,963; copper, $28,869,305; lead, $7,236,026. Total gross result, $126,289,536. The "commercial" value at which the several metals named herein have been estimated is: Silver, 67c. per oz.; copper, 11c. per lb., and lead, $3 per cwt. The production by States was as follows: California, $15,631,391; Nevada, $2,759,364; Montana, $37,270,500; Utah, $10,383,759; Colorado, $26,854,844; Arizona, $9,265,917; Idaho, $8,125,182; Dakota, $4,794,765; Alaska, $2,750,955. The other amounts are small. The exports of silver during the past year to Japan, China, the Straits, etc., have been as follows: From London, $33,968,620; from San Francisco, $9,947,776. Total, $43,916,396, as against $43,956,787 last year.

The Fireman's Fund Election.

The annual meeting of the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company was held on Tuesday last. In spite of the hard times which have borne so hardly on other companies, the company made a remarkably good financial showing, the net surplus being swelled to $1,104,726. against $987,205 for the preceding year. The old Board of Directors was re-elected, as follows: D. J. Staples, John O. Earl, John Barton, John H. Gardiner, John T. Wright, Thomas S. Chard, W. H. Brown, F. W. Lougee, J. C. Coleman, John Birmingham, and William J. Dutton. The officers remain the same as last year.

The Deal In Powder.

The Giant shares were carried up to $30 during the week, but whether the good folks with money to throw to the birds got trapped, it is difficult to say. The compact which is supposed to affect these debt-laden shares to a greater extent than those in great solid concerns like the California, is still conspicuous by its absence.

"Hear the Crier" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

OAKLAND must be a matrimonial harvest field for aged dames and ancient spinsters. Two frisky bridegrooms over there have this week taken unto themselves wives older than themselves, and as their own ages in the marriage licenses are given as sixty-nine and seventy-four respectively, it will be seen that youthfulness is at a discount with Cupid across the bay. The Town Crier predicts that within a month's time there will not be an old maid or elderly widow in the city limits in San Francisco. Ten cents will take them to Oakland, and while there's life there's hope.

YANKING molars from the jaws of howling patients is splendid exercise for knights of the forceps, and it would seem that any dentist with a fairly good practice could keep his muscles in proper trim without joining an athletic club. In a new organization of this character that has just filed its articles of incorporation, a local nerve-killer has been made a prominent officer, and it is now whispered that he intends to become a sort of dental Sandow, who will be able to pick up his patients and shake them off a tooth, instead of extracting the latter in the old-fashioned way.

WHETHER Miss Lillian Ashley will hide her attractive limbs in a convent or will advertise them before the footlights, remains to be seen. It is, of course, hard to believe that she was damaged to the extent of $100,000, but she probably knew best what value to put upon her earthly charms.

IT appears that the unfortunate souls who shuffle off this mortal coil via the Morgue route, and hope by dying unidentified to secure peace at last, without putting their relatives and friends to the inconvenience of burying them, are to be denied even the poor privilege of interment in the Potter's Field. The doctors want them to experiment on, so, instead of being decently planted, these hapless bodies must meet a pickled fate, in the interests of science. This is enough to make a man prefer the uncertainties of life to the certainties of unidentified dissolution.

FISTICUFFS, 'sdeath, divorce;
A murderer on the wing;
A Morgue that prays that another corse
Each hour its way may bring;
Bullets and knives and thieves;
Bloodshed and birds of prey—
These are what San Francisco weaves
In her story of a day.

VIGOROUS and effective methods are being employed to stamp out crime in Alaska, and that territory is now a law-abiding and peaceable place. These frontier localities, supposed to be the hot-beds of criminal lawlessness, can teach San Francisco a thing or two in decency and self-respect. The secret of the matter is, that Alaska has not become too highly civilized to be respectable.

MARY and Thomas Finnegan, both deaf mutes, are trying to get divorced, and Judge Troutt has been sitting up nights trying to master the intricacies of the sign language. It appears that the Finnegans, according to their own testimony, fight continually, but their neighbors assert that they have never heard them speak a cross word.

EX-SENATOR Grady of Fresno is in hot water. He is accused of battering a waiter, and putting the final touches to the exercise by chewing his ear. The Town Crier is not surprised that a Fresno man should be violent and bloodthirsty when at large, but cannot forbear expressing astonishment at his singular taste.

THE Truckee carnival has enabled some scores of San Franciscans to taste of the "delights" of the "good, old-fashioned winter;" such joys as thousands of Eastern people come to California to avoid.

THE Examiner's man Friday is at present running the Santa Cruz Penny Press; into the ground, presumably.

MURDERER Butler has done so much to advertise the virtuous city of San Francisco, that he should be met by a body of our public officials and prominent business men, and presented with some token of our regard. A volume of decisions in relation to capital crimes, showing how long it takes to convict men of his calibre in California, would prove hopeful reading for him, and, supposing he saves his neck elsewhere, might induce him to come and take up his residence with us in the near future.

A GOOD deacon explained to an Oakland congregation last Sunday that the earthquake shock which disturbed the worshipers was "simply the voice of the Lord speaking to his people." This pious interpretation of the occurrence is rendered somewhat doubtful from the circumstance that the same jolt was experienced in the Examiner office. The staff of that establishment is so accustomed to "shake-ups" that the event was scarcely remarked.

PEOPLE who turn on the gas, as the easiest and best method of settling life's woes, should leave a deposit with the landlady beforehand. There is not any too much profit in the boarding house business, no matter what the texture and fineness of the hash provided, and it is a trifle inconsiderate to thus play into the hands of a corporation. Will suicidists please be a little less thoughtless?

THE man who created a sensation the other night by bursting with a yell from his room in the early hours of morning, and turning a back somersault in his robe de nuit before the terrified guests, should be pitied rather than blamed for his unusual conduct. It was not delirium tremens, nor sudden nuttiuess. He had inadvertently fallen asleep while perusing the Sunday Examiner.

RUMORS from afar declare that the theme of the next Woman's Congress will be "Education." This is encouraging. By next year the ladies may get down to solid business and discuss cookery. What this community needs is good digestion, and in this, fair woman holds man's life and temper in her hands. Give us proper food, and the millennium is not an impossibility.

THE actress who desires an honest name,
Must see her "star" hopes glimmer to a candle,
The while, across the footlights, like a flame,
Another woman soars to fortune, fame
And money, through the magic aid of scandal.

HAYES VALLEY residents are weary of groping about in darkness, falling into defective sewers, yielding to the too-familiar embrace of the festive footpad and the merry thug. They announce their determination to have light, and plenty of it, throughout that district. Thus, bit by bit, the work of reform goes hopefully on.

A WOMAN in this city attempted suicide this week, because she had two husbands, which was one more than she coveted. Strauge, very strange. And there are others who cannot succeed in landing so much as one upon the shore of matrimony. Things are so unevenly distributed in this world!

GOOD news. The main corridor in the New City Hall is going to be washed out every night hereafter, instead of every three years. By the time the entire building is purified, it may occur to the powers that be to purify the politics and people, as well as the pavements and floors of that historic structure.

IT is not fair to jump to the conclusion that the post-mistress across the bay who eloped with a storekeeper and married him, did so merely to get the right to open his letters without being liable to the law. No woman's curiosity would carry her quite so far.

IT is refreshing to know that the presence of a lady in the Board of Education would cause "embarrassment" to the honorable members. We never imagined the blush of modesty could tinge the cheeks of these gentlemen.

"WHO was the man they used to call Durrant?
What was his crime?" The Crier does not know.
Your pardon, dear subscriber, but he can't

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT.

DEAR SIR: The following is our Annual Report of Precious Metals produced in the States and Territories west of the Missouri River (including British Columbia) during 1896, which shows in the aggregate: Gold, $54,399,242; Silver, $35,784,963; Copper, $28,859,305; Lead, $7,236,026. Total gross result, $126,289,536. The "commercial" value at which the several metals named herein have been estimated is: Silver, 67 cts. per oz.; Copper, 11 cts. per lb.; and Lead, $3.00 per cwt.

Allowance must always be made for probable variations from reported figures, by reason of constantly increasing facilities for transporting bullion, ores and base metals from the mines outside of the express and the difficulty of getting entirely reliable data from private sources. Estimates obtained in this way are liable to be exaggerated and are, to a considerable degree, guesswork; but with some modifications on this account, made herein, the general results reached, while only approximately correct, may be accepted as the closest approximation possible under the circumstances.

ONE of the most striking fads of the day is the armorial bearings, crests, etc., which are considered de rigueur for all society people, and it is not a little amusing the uphill work—real work—it is to many getting up the requisite lozenge for note paper, silver, and carriage panel. In London, people who wish their crests done (if not already in use) begin by tracing descent, searching genealogy, and the like. In New York and San Francisco this method is, for obvious reasons, not the one followed, so an expert designer is called in to aid the taste and wishes of the wealthy fashionables who wish to be up-to-date. Several humorous stories are told of what has happened in Gotham, where people have been on the hunt for crests and mottos, one of them strongly reminiscent of the famous mot of Dean Swift, who, on being asked by a rich tobacconist to suggest a proper motto for his carriage crest, immediately responded: "Why, Quid rides, of course." However, as our local Four Hundred is of more interest to us than the doings of London or New York, we took the pains a few days ago to examine a display made by a leading stationer of the recently executed crests and coats of arms designed to order for our swagger set. There being "no earthly reason why we can't have strawberry leaves if we feel like it," to quote from a leading hud, that ducal insignia is used extensively as well as the five-pointed coronet and the fleur de lis. Hands and daggers, griffens' heads, and lions' couchant are frequent, but the design of old castles with knights in armour seems to be a favorite style. One lady, evidently of a sentimental turn of mind, has chosen a transfixing heart on a shield. Another pretty devise of originality is a huge stack of glittering gold; motto, "Win gold and pile it." Yet another shows a steaming locomotive; motto, "Bound by steel." Of course, these are the crests merely; the armorial bearings are all more or less gorgeous in coloring and heraldry, and mark an epoch in our fashionable progress at this fin de siecle, for no one who is any one can afford to be without a crest nowadays.

Another mark of our gradual adoption of things British is the hunt, which is apparently hovering about from country to town, unsettled where to stay. The difficulty of drawing sufficiently large numbers of participants to the San Mateo line to make the thing a success, has induced the indefatigable members of the Pacific Avenue riding club to take a hand and try what can be done in the way of a hunt over hedges, fences, ditches, and fields in the Ingle-side District, whereby the club may display its horsemanship, and the city folk may indulge in joining the sport, either as riders or onlookers. That it will be a success of course remains to be seen, but at all events it will be a brilliant "try," as many of the leading lights of the swim are among the members of the riding school.

Gossip says that when those thoroughly equipped young ladies, the Misses Ethel Keeney and Leontine Blakeman, finally enter society as acknowledged grown-up girls, they will be the sensation of the season; also that Miss Florence Breckenridge is another girl who will make a brilliant addition to society's ranks. So it behooves those girls who are stars of this year's social firmament to make hay while the sun shines, and get out of the way of the new lights.

Several feasts are in prospect for our epicures. On Tuesday last, a swell banquet was given at the Presidio for three hundred persons. On Tuesday next, the Laurel Hall Club will give a supper for two hundred and fifty guests at Beethoven Hall, and on February 4th, Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Spitz will celebrate their golden wedding by giving a dinner to seventy-five of their friends at the Concordia Club. All these functions will be attended to by Max Abraham, the well-known caterer.

Miss Elizabeth Carroll's many friends are growling at not having been allowed the pleasure of seeing her in her nuptial robe, as they had hoped a church wedding would have been her choice, but Miss Elizabeth is nothing if not positive, and she is said to have set her little foot down very positively on an elaborate wedding, reserving all that sort of thing for the Whittier mansion.

If rumor speaks by the card, one of the bridesmaids who will attend Miss Carroll will hereafter be a bride ere many moons have waned. "Miss Julia Crocker, of course," say our readers. Not so, dear friends. Stately Miss Romie Wallace is the one meant.

The perfect delight with which young Boardman was greeted upon his return to health and appearance at the card party by the owner of those lovely eyes, should have satisfied him that one conquest at least has fallen to his share in the new Year.

Sausalito folks are greatly exercised over some city gossip which declares that Claude Terry Hamilton has followed Charley McIntosh's example, and is engaged.

The new army contingent can boast of several pretty women among them, as evidenced by the military hall-room on Tuesday evening last.

Japanese curios are sought after the whole world over but in no place can such rare ones be obtained as in San Francisco. The visitor to the store of G. T. Marsh & Co., 625 Market Street, will obtain the best obtainable at very reasonable prices. The store is well worth a visit.

"The difference at present between the handsome young woman and the codfish," said the cheerful idiot, in answer to a question he had evidently put to himself before sitting down at the table—"the difference between the handsome young woman and the codfish is, that one has a chance to become a fall bride and the other to become a ball fried." After that the hired girl passed them.—Indianapolis Journal.

In response to many inquiries from all parts of the country about the Railway and Dock Construction Company

The officials hereby give full information in regard to the company, its business and prospects.

The company offers 20,000 shares of stock for sale in lots to suit purchasers at $20 per share. The par value is $100 per share—full paid and unassessable—stockholders have no individual liability whatever. The company has no indebtedness of any kind—is in solid financial condition—and, as there are no bonds nor mortgages, all the earnings go to the stockholders.

The adoption of this Company's system of construction by the United States Government, or any Foreign Government, or by any one of the large cities in America or Europe will cause the stock to rise above par ($100) immediately.

The most conservative investors, old shrewd bear operators on the stock exchange, have bought this stock and confidently predict it is sure to pay large dividends and sell at over $200 a share as the Railway and Dock Construction Co. commence business under much more favorable conditions than did the Bell Telephone Co., whose stock rose from about $10 to over 200; or the original Edison Electric Co., whose stock rose from 45 to $3000 a share, or the many other companies owning useful inventions whose stocks rose rapidly in value while paying large dividends to the alert original investors.

Many prominent men in banking, railway and financial circles and other expert judges of stock values predict that this stock will pay large dividends and will sell at over $200 per share for the following reasons:

The Railway and Dock Construction Company controls all the rights, titles, patents and interests in and the sole, absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell the new indestructible piles that do away altogether with the millions of wooden piles heretofore used everywhere, which only last a short time, as alternate moisture and drying and the marine worms soon destroy the wood, and leave a deceptive shell, incapable to sustain a load that requires the full strength of the original pile. Old wooden piles must be continually replaced at great expense.

Nothing can compete with the indestructible Pile in the construction of piers, docks, bulkheads, sea-walls, foundations for bridges, lighthouses, jetties, breakwaters or other improvements in rivers, harbors or on the sea coast.

This pile is an absolute necessity in railway trestlework as it guarantees safety, and it will last forever, and there is an enormous demand for it.

One defective wooden pile derailing a train causes a loss of many thousands of dollars in lives and property destroyed.

Applications are pouring in from engineers, contractors and railway officials all over the United States. These men are quick to see the certainty of profit. They are perhaps better able to judge than others, because, out of a total of 1891 railroads, 373 of these railway companies are now preparing to build 20,547 miles of new line. The great superiority of the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system of solid, substantial, indestructible trestle work is causing the demand in this special field.

Estimated earnings from this one source of profit will pay $7 per share annual dividends—this is equal to 35 per cent. cash dividends per year on stock bought now at present price of $20 per share.

Other and larger sources of profit will come from contracts now in view, viz:—

In place of the old wooden docks, covered by temporary sheds, which now disfigure the water fronts of our cities, this company will build solid, indestructible piers, on which permanent iron, stone or brick buildings are put up just the same as on land.

Private owners of dock property as well as dock officials in the numerous cities are becoming aware of the great advantage of using the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system of building indestructible piers to make a solid foundation, upon which large buildings can be erected, from which they can get big revenues for rentals, etc.

$27,000,000 have already been expended in improving Southern harbors and their approaches.

In projects now under way over fifty million dollars will be spent in improving navigation in rivers, bays, etc., throughout the country on jetties, breakwaters, and other work in which the indestructible Pile is a great necessity.

The city of New York is spending $5,000,000 a year improving the city water front.

In a private conversation Hon. J. Sergeant Cram, ex-President of the Board of Dock Commissioners said: "There is an immense fortune in this company's system of construction."

The U. S. Senate Committee have recommended the expenditure of eighty million dollars for the protection of our seacoast. About ten millions a year will be spent during the next eight years.

The United States Government spent about $10,000,000 in deepening the entrance of the Mississippi to divert tidal action by old style work, which will be supplanted in future by the Railway and Dock Construction Company's system. $6,000,000 has already been expended on the two immense jetties in the bay at Galveston: they are simply loose rock dumped into the water. Each jetty is about 4½ miles long and forms a continuous pyramid 100 feet wide at the bottom, tapering to 15 feet wide at the top above the water. The Railway and Dock Construction Company build indestructible jetties of the same size at the bottom as the top and save this enormous waste of stone and labor.

The "St. Louis Critic" strongly advocates the adoption of this company's system of indestructible jetties to deepen the Mississippi at St. Louis.

To provide additional funds to execute some of this work, the company offers 20,000 shares to the public in lots to suit at the low price of $20.00 per share in order to have the stock quickly taken. There are no salaried officials. The money derived from the sale of stock, when not used in profitable construction work, remains in the company's treasury.

Many leading marine engineers and experts say: "This company's system of construction is coming into universal use in building all improvements in rivers and harbors."

As the business in sight is too large for this company to handle alone, the subsidiary companies now being organized in the principal States each pay a certain amount in cash and one-third of their capital stock into the Railway and Dock Construction Co.'s treasury. In addition to large sums in cash the company will receive about $20,000,000 in securities in this way, on which dividends will be paid from the earnings of the subsidiary companies. These dividends all go to the holders of Railway and Dock Construction stock.

With a large surplus and an ample cash working capital the company will hold assets of $200 per share for each share now offered at $20 when all details are completed.

Application will be made to list the shares on the stock exchange.

Owing to the financial depression and uncertainty before the election the Railway and Dock Construction Company would not accept numerous contracts for work amounting to about three millions of dollars. They were offered first mortgage bonds in payment but the bonds could not be sold at that time in New York or London at satisfactory prices. English bankers are now negotiating to raise a large block of Railway and Dock Construction stock and apply for an official quotation on the London Stock Exchange.

DEAR EDITH—It is surprising what a quantity of dresses are trimmed with fur, both for day and evening wear. Here is a dinner gown of cabbage green satin, which is a good model of the fur-trimmed indoor dress. The edge of the trained skirt is trimmed with a fifteen-inch band made up alternately of antique lace insertion and bands of golden otter as wide as the lace, the fur bands being edged with two tiny folds of mauve velvet. This affords a wonderfully fine color combination, the velvet edge showing up the golden tinge of fur, and contrasts beautifully with the green satin. The low satin bodice is partly covered with a lace Figaro, edged with fur and velvet, the lace being embroidered all over with amethysts. The tight sleeve is of jeweled lace with a satin shoulder drapery held with amethyst brooches. The waist on the pointed bodice is marked by four tiny bands of mauve velvet.

Mrs. Annie Jenness Miller says that she believes that the house dress of the future will be short enough; "that the woman who goes upstairs or who goes around with all kinds of household implements, will be able to go upstairs naturally, three steps at a time if she wants to, and get all the benefit she can out of that exercise. Going up and down stairs is the best exercise in the world. And yet you can find learned doctors who will warn women against going up and down stairs. They do it justly, too, because the learned doctor knows that a woman who has a lot of skirts pressing down, who lifts herself up and down stairs on levers, so to speak, churns all the vital organs and does herself infinite harm.

"I have invented a houseworker's dress which any woman can carry out for herself," Mrs. Miller went on to say. "It does not require a pattern. All you have to do is to make the skirt come half way between the knees and the ankle, and make the waist and skirt all in one piece. Then you can have a little Eton jacket hanging over a chair, and when a caller comes in all you have to do is to slip off your apron and slip on your jacket, and you can entertain your friends in the parlor. That is utility in dress."

For evening dress the round-waisted blouse-bodice is giving place to the corsage with small points back and front. This is good news because the points suit all figures; the waistbelt does not. The belt demands a small waist and a graceful slenderness of build. Figures of the broad type look far better in a pointed bodice.

Grotesque indeed are some of the latest "picture" hats sent out, composite as to decoration and fearfully and wonderfully made. The brims in many cases are irregular frills of velvet, the crown ridiculously high, the folds arranged in the most fantastic fashion. The apex of some of the Mother Goose shapes sometimes threatens to overweigh the base of the crown. Jeweled pins, clasps and slides are put in to keep the puffs and folds in place. If a plain-covered shape, the crown is of the jam-pot order, 7 or 8 inches high perhaps. Bands of satin, bead galloon or jet encircle the crown, there is a lowering bouquet of black ostrich feathers with others quite as long sprawling anywhere over the brim, sometimes directly in front right over the face, or overhanging the brim by some inches at the back.

AT THE CAPITOL.

SACRAMENTO, January 21, 1897.

THE exposé of the outrageous squandering of the taxpayers' money in the temporary organization of the Assembly, seems to have had the effect of causing that body to think a bit when any appropriation bill or resolution disbursing money comes up for action. There is a combination of Republican members, who, with the Democrats and Populists, will oppose any measure that savors of an extravagant disposal of the public funds, and it is to be hoped they will be able to keep the wayward members in check.

In relation to the temporary roll scandal, I have been reliably informed that investigation showed that the accommodating Chief Clerk of the Assembly, Mr. Duckworth, who, by the way, thinks he has been "roasted"—possibly because he feels he deserves a "roast"—appointed some thirty attachés on the recommendation of the temporary Sergeant-at-Arms, Parkinson, and from two to six attachés for certain Assemblymen who had political debts to pay. There are some Republican members who think it would be good party politics to relieve Mr. Duckworth of his onerous duties, and find some clerk who is competent as well as honest. It would not be hard to find one as competent. I have heard nothing more of the Breiling charges, and suppose they will be overlooked along with the Duckworth temporary roll scandal. Justice is blind, but Assembly investigating committees are deaf, dumb, and blind.

Since the above was written, the Republican Assembly caucus has reached a commendable decision. If Mr. Duckworth will not resign, he may be impeached. Mr. Cutter is reported as having sarcastically remarked that the members of the Assembly who aided the stuffing of the Assembly temporary attaché roll might consistently also resign. The State would really be the gainer thereby.

There has been exhibited here during the week a voting machine, that has attracted not only much attention, but much favorable comment, and there is little doubt but that a law will be passed this session permitting the use of machines at elections. The machine referred to is the Ducas voting machine, and those who have seen others say this is the simplest and best of any. It is so arranged that a person can only vote once for each officer to be elected; for two or more when that number are to be voted for, and mixed, straight or independent candidates can be voted. The ingenuity displayed in its construction is wonderful, and not alone does it automatically totalize each candidate's vote, but on a paper roll marks consecutively the vote of each candidate. Mr. Ducas, the inventor, explains its simplicity and excellence to large crowds all day long.

There has been introduced a bill making it an offense, as well as grounds for damages, to refuse a negro any privilege or accommodation allowed a white man. From what I've seen there is little need of a law of the kind in California. If negroes have not already these craved-for rights, they take them and a good many more. A law curtailing their privileges might be more in place.

The woman suffragist is once more offensive hereabouts. They are nothing if not persistent, and probably will get little but trouble for their pains. A new argument with them is that Chinamen voted in San Francisco, and they want to know if a woman is not as good as a Chinaman.

Senator Mahoney was last week chosen Chairman of the San Francisco delegation, and Senator Percy Henderson, Secretary. Senator Samuel Braunhart is reported to have nominated and voted for himself for Chairman, being violently opposed to Mahoney. Senator Braunhart ought to feel himself highly complimented by himself.

Assemblyman Power of San Francisco has introduced a bill providing for the construction of the sea wall from Market street to the China Basin.

Colonel Thomas F. Barry has been urging the passage of bills for the relief of several National Guardsmen who were injured during the railroad strike of 1894, while in the performance of their duties. It is to be hoped these just claims against the State will be favorably considered.

Senator Bert has introduced a bill prohibiting nickel-in-the-slot machines of any description. It ought to pass.

Senator Feeney has introduced a couple of suspicious-looking bills. One prohibits the lowering of an upper berth in a sleeping-car unless it is occupied by a bona-fide tenant, and the other prohibits employees of telephone or electric light companies from going into a private house or place of business to repair or string wires without a written permit, under penalty of fine. These are a fine-looking brace of cinch bills. However, there are a number of others already introduced—not by Mr. Feeney, however.

Assemblyman Treacy, who was elected on the despised so-called "Buckley" ticket, is one of the most capable men from San Francisco, and has the honor of bringing about the passage of the first bill this session—his own measure, fixing the minimum wages to be paid on public work at $2 per day. It is too bad that there are not more Treacys in the San Francisco delegation.

One of the most highly respected and able members of the Senate is C. M. Simpson, who represents the Thirty-sixth District. Mr. Simpson is a hold-over Republican, and last session, and in this as well, his record is a most favorable one. When Mr. Simpson has anything to say he says it, and his influence is not second to any man in the Senate. Down in Pasadena where Mr. Simpson lives, he is thought highly of. He was a member of the Assembly in the session of 1893, and prior to that was a member of the City Council. Before coming to California from Kansas, where he resided, Mr. Simpson was clerk of the District Court for eight years, Councilman, City Attorney and Mayor in turn, for men of ability and integrity are appreciated as much in Kansas as they are in California. Mr. Simpson is a talented lawyer, and is chairman of the very important Judiciary Committee, besides being a member of the Committees on Commerce, Harbors, Rivers and Coast Defences; Corporations; Counties and County Boundaries, and Labor and Capital. Senator Simpson is an untiring worker, and it is to be hoped an appreciated one by his constituents.

C. M. Simpson

There is a young man in the Assembly to whom I want to call particular attention, because he will, and has, directed it to himself, and has laid the stepping stones to a bright political future. I refer to

E. J. Emmons, the talented Representative of the Sixty-sixth District. Mr. Emmons was the fusion nominee of the Populists and the Democrats, and being with the minority of the Assembly, can do comparatively little, from a political standpoint. However, with his great ability he has forced himself to the front as a recognized leader, and in point of ability, is the peer of any member of the lower house. In Bakersfield, where Mr. Emmons resides and has a large and lucrative law business, he is universally liked and respected. The friend of every just cause or measure, and the open, avowed enemy of anything that savors of chicanery or dishonesty, he is the kind of man specially fitted for a legislator. A forcible and ready debater, he is often heard, but wastes no time nor words in saying. Mr. Emmons has introduced and will urge the passage of considerable important legislation, and he is a valuable member of the committees on County and Township Governments; Contested Elections; Federal Relations; and Judiciary.

E. J. Emmons.

A lawyer of ability, an orator of note, and a legislator who is a leader in the councils of his party, is Senator Harry V. Morehouse, of San Jose, who so fitly represents the Thirty-first District. He is tireless in the discharge of his duties, and the vast amount of work he has taken upon himself to perform shows that Santa Clara County made no mistake in choosing him. Mr. Morehouse came to California with his parents when a child four years of age, and after a proper schooling was admitted to the bar. He was District Attorney of Monterey County, and practiced his profession at Salinas, before moving to San Jose. He is chairman of the Committee on Labor and Capital, one of the most important committees this session, as well as a member of the Committees on City, City and County and Town Government, Education and Public Morals; Judiciary; and Public Buildings.

Harry V. Morehouse.

WELL KNOWN IN THE MINING WORLD.

Now that the mining industry has received so healthy a stimulus, and new and paying properties are cropping up all over the West, the firms that are interested in the manufacture and erection of Mining and Milling Machinery will undoubtedly be the first to experience a return of good times. Mr. Rogers, of the firm of White, Rogers & Co., 306 Pine street, speaking in this connection the other day, said the firm of which he is a member and which is composed of experienced and practical Engineers, has already received many new, and some very large orders for Mining and Milling machinery and supplies, all of which they are now able to furnish their patrons at prices much lower than formerly prevailed on this Coast.

Some of the largest stamp Mills and Hoisting plants have been constructed by this well-known firm, the members of which have been engaged in this business for the past thirty-six years, during which period they have gained a wide experience in Milling and Mining, which now proves of great value to their many clients, needing Mining or Milling Machinery of any description.

In mining more than in almost any other branch of business practical experience is required for the proper selection and construction of reduction works to treat the various grades of ores discovered.

Many good prospects and even well developed mines have been ruined by the want of this experience, and the employment of incompetent persons to equip them.

The best is none too good for success, and it is manifestly foolish to employ a shoemaker when a Lawyer or Doctor is required—but strange as it may appear this is frequently done in a mining sense and failure naturally results. The wisdom of dealing with competent, reliable firms in any profession where such services are needed, requires no demonstration to successful men, and this is particularly true of mining.

In addition to the firm's wide experience as constructing engineers, ranging over every mineral section from Alaska to South America, they have been able to obtain very valuable knowledge of the mines in all of these various districts and can in many instances obtain valuable property at very reasonable prices and sometimes secure great bargains, which not only advances their own interests but all others, when experienced men become interested in either new or old mining districts.

This knowledge has often proved of great value, and has helped to promote the healthy growth of a legitimate business industry, which mining always is, when conducted on lines of well-established business practice.

IRRITATION OF THE THROAT AND HOARSENESS are immediately relieved by "Brown's Bronchial Troches." Have them always ready.

Mistress-Maid

both have their part in the great savings that come from Pearline.

Suppose you're the mistress. There's the economy of it the saving of time, etc., and the actual money that's saved by doing away with that steady wear and tear on everything washed. Suppose you're the maid. There's the saving of labor; the absence of rubbing; the hardest part of the housework made easier and pleasanter. But suppose you are mistress and maid, both in one, doing your own work. Then there is certainly twice as much reason why you should do every bit of your washing and cleaning with Pearline.

SOCIETY

OUR beauty and fashion shone in divided ranks on Tuesday evening, but society is now so large three or four functions can take place au même temps, and there will still be more than enough to go round. The musical events of the week have been, of course, the Nordica concerts, and the opening one of the series drew such an audience to the Baldwin on Tuesday evening as has not been seen in that pretty little theatre for many moons. The ball at the Presidio the same evening was one of those delightful button affairs that are always so enjoyed by our belles. The civilian beaux might perhaps tell a different tale. The hop room was an extremely pretty sight, with its military adornments of bunting, sabres, small arms, flowers and foliage, and the guests were made welcome by their hosts, who were resplendent in all the glory of military toggery. Gold lace and bright buttons were largely in evidence among the men, and as for the ladies, they all looked charmingly in most becoming and handsome attire. Dancing was the order of the evening, only interrupted by an elaborate supper served towards midnight, after which the dance was resumed for several hours longer.

Mrs. Benson's gathering at the Presidio on Monday was much enjoyed by her guests; so also was Mrs. Avery McCarthy's "at home" on Tuesday. Among the pleasant affairs of the month have been the Wednesday "at homes" of Mrs. Southard Hoffman and her daughter. Mrs. Pedar Sather's recent luncheon in Oakland was an exceedingly pleasant gathering; it was given in honor of Mrs. J. M. Phillips, to meet whom thirty guests were invited. Last night the Friday Fortnightly Club, of Oakland, had a dance in Ebell Hall.

The meeting of the San Francisco Friday Fortnightlies last week was one of the most charming affairs of the season. It was an army cotillion, and the decorations of the hall were entirely military in character, consisting of bunting and arms artistically combined with flowers and greens, and the uniforms worn by the officers gave a finishing touch to the brilliancy of the scene. The cotillion was led by Lieutenants Noble and Dana Kilburn, who had complete control of the affair, and the first set was entirely of officers, with some of our prettiest belles in lovely gowns as their partners. Four figures were danced, the sabre figure being especially admired, and also seen for the first time. The attendance was very large, and the festivities prolonged until a later hour than usual at these parties. The lady managers have decided that the next dance of the club shall be a domino and mask affair.

Another dance of Friday evening last was that of the Winter Cotillion Club at Beethoven Hall, when some original figures were introduced by the leader, Thos. P. Ross, who had Miss L. S. Young for his partner.

The domino party given last Saturday evening by Mrs. A. Hecht at the San Francisco Verein Club, for the début of her daughter Edith, was also a success. The guests were received in the parlors of the club, and at 10 o'clock, each domino being provided with a small lighted lantern in the shape of a domino, marched to the ballroom, where dancing began, and the evening was one of great enjoyment. Supper was served at 12 o'clock, when dominos and masks were removed. Then followed more dancing, which was kept up till the morning light appeared.

On Saturday afternoon Mrs. William Kohl gave a tea at the Palace Hotel, for the purpose of introducing her new daughter-in-law, Mrs. Fred Kohl, to her friends. The Maple Hall, which was used for the occasion, was prettily decorated, a stringed orchestra was in attendance, and delicious refreshments were served. At the Berkshire Mrs. C. O. Scott gave a tea also, at which the recent bride, Mrs. W. T. Seson, was the guest of honor.

How the wedding bells will chime next week! Every day nearly one or more splittings are named to take place. Tuesday has been selected by Miss Teen Goodall for her marriage to Hugo D. Keil, and the nuptial knot is to be tied at the Goodall residence on McAllister street. Wednesday, however, seems to be the favorite one, for on it will be celebrated the weddings of Miss Rose Eppinger and Dr. James Sharp at the home of the bride on Octavia street, of Miss Lizzie Carroll and Will Whittier, which will be solemnized at noon by Archbishop Riordan at the Carroll residence on Van Ness avenue, and in the evening at the Hotel Colonial Miss Martha Shainwald and L. M. Myers will be the bride and groom. Miss Carroll has chosen the Misses Romietta Wallace and Julia Crocker to attend her as bridesmaids. Her sister Gertrude will be maid of honor, and Milton Latham the groom's best man. Another wedding of next week will be that of Miss Mollie Torbert, one of San Francisco's greatest beauties and pet belles, to George Kirkpatrick, and, to the regret of her California friends, the ceremony will not take place here, but at the Church of All Angels in New York on Thursday evening, after which a dancing reception will be given at Sherry's by her sister, lovely Sheda Torbert, now Mrs. Valentine Snyder of New York. The month will close with the wedding of Miss Mollie Hutchinson and Ernest Piexotto, which will be solemnized in New Orleans on the 31st.

The wedding of Miss Agnes Smedberg and Max Rosenfield will be an event of the Eastertide, the first week in May having been decided upon as the date for its celebration.

Next week will be a pet one with our fashionables, as it promises to be well filled up with gay doings. One of the leaders will be the reception which Mrs. Stanford is giving in honor of Bishop and Mrs. Newman at her magnificent home on California street, the first time the house has been opened for entertaining since the death of Senator Stanford. It will be an afternoon affair and on a very elaborate scale, the hours from 3 till 6 p. m., during which time it is safe to say all society will be seen.

Paris appears to be the Mecca of Californians this winter. Among those there at a recent date were: Mr. and Mrs. Delmas, Mr. and Mrs. Joe Redding, Mrs. Crit Thornton, Mrs. Colton, Dr. and Mrs. Breyfogle, Miss Maud Howard, Mrs. George Loomis, Charley Felton and Mr. and Mrs. Ed Schmiedell. We may soon expect to see the Schmiedells, and in Chicago they will be joined by Miss Grace Martin, who is visiting friends there, and who will journey homeward with the Schmiedells. Mrs. Harry Hunt and Miss Hunt have returned from their trip to Japan. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hicks of Los Angeles are visiting Mrs. John S. Hofer at her home on Gough street.

The delightful Hotel Rafael has long been considered the most fashionable winter and summer society resort of the Pacific Coast. It is only fifty minutes removed from San Francisco, and our best belles and beaux congregate there all the year round. Since Major Warfield, of the California Hotel, took personal charge of the Hotel Rafael, it has become the Mecca of society folk, who look forward with anticipation to spending a few weeks, or even months, there. The climate of San Rafael is the healthiest on the Pacific Coast.

Miss Rosamond O'Connell made her début at the Grand Opera House on Monday night in the melodrama, Against the Stream, when she was cast as "Lively Mag," a small part, in which, however, the young débutante made a success. Miss O'Connell has a quality most important in an actress, perfect self-possession, clear enunciation, and the faculty of suiting the action to the word. She has a promising career in the profession of her choice.

Numerous invitations have been issued by the management of the Hotel Mateo, at San Mateo, for a dance to be given at that fashionable place on Tuesday evening next. Great preparations have been made, and the leaders of our Four Hundred will assemble there to indulge in a few hours of solid happiness.

Dr. Herzstein will leave the city on an extended vacation next Sunday. He expects to be gone about five months, and besides visiting the leading cities in the East, will also take in London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna.

Miss Carrie Lauer, daughter of Mr. Chas. H. Lauer, a prominent citizen of Eugene, Oregon, is visiting at the residence of Miss Friedlander, 2018 Buchanan street.

Dr. William A. Bryant has returned from his trip to Tahiti, much improved in health.

AT THE RACES.

THE two weeks' meeting of the California Jockey Club at the pretty race track across the bay, has been an interesting one, from the number of fast races run and numerous sensational results. The sport has been clean and above the average. The talent has twice witnessed the defeat of the pride of the Burns & Waterhouse stable, Mt. McGregor II., by Mr. Purser's Buckwa. Buckwa, by the way, never developed any stake quality, until imbued with our glorious climate, and its performances were truly wonderful, seeing that it was merely a selling plater, around Milwaukee and Gravesend. California, Mr. Coulter's good mare, captured the Berkeley Handicap with the greatest of ease. Osric II. has bested Arrezzo in two battles royal. The son and daughter of Faverdale and Sweet Home battled for the Naglee Stakes. The impressive win of Mr. Purser's Scarf Pin, in the San Pablo Stakes, and the defeat of the greatly advertised Flacon, by Queen Blazes, in the first two-year-old event of the season, were great happenings. The attendance has been away above the average. Next week Ingleside reopens for two weeks, with every indication of being as successful as the preceding meet.

Mr. Purser's Scarf Pin and Buckwa, who won their first starts in California, also won their first starts at Gravesend, N. Y.

Mr. Dunne's Formal, who defeated Ferrier, Mr. Hobart's crack, ran fifth in the last Realization, which was won by Requital.

Mr. Dunne's Preston, who won his first six races in California, also won the first race run at Sheephead Bay last season.

Colonel Burns' Sweet Faverdale, full sister to Preston, won four races in the East, and was five times placed.

Mr. Spreckels has a promising youngster in Boadicea. Blazes, the sire of Queen Blazes, also sired that good horse, Kamsin, a frequent winner in California.

Mr. Hobart's crack, Bright Phoebus, the Realization winner of 1895, was left at the post in his first start this season.

Out of the first 414 races run this season, favorites have won 201 times, second choices 104 times, and outsiders in the betting 109 times, a truly wonderful showing. The ten leading jockeys and number of wins are as follows: Jones, 79; H. Martin, 59; W. Martin, 30; Thorpe, 20; Isom, 19; Slaughter, 18; Murphy, 17; Shields, 11.

The Brooklyn Handicap closed with thirty entries; the Suburban closed with forty-four entries.

At the coming Ingleside meeting there will be three two-year-old races during the first week, viz., on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday. On Wednesday there will be six races, all one mile or over. The Tarpey Stakes come off on January 30th; Hobart Stakes on February 6th, and the Ingleside, of four miles, on Washington's Birthday.

A COURSE of three delightful and instructive lectures will be given by Professor David Starr Jordan, Rev. Chas. W. Wendte and Professor Charles Mills Gayley at Golden Gate Hall on the 28th inst., and February 4th and 11th. These lectures will be given under the auspices of the Mercantile Library Auxiliary, and will undoubtedly be well attended. Tickets for the course, $1; admission for single lectures, 50 cents. The coupons may be used for one evening if desired.

THE Cosmos Club will soon be located in the building formerly occupied by Miss Lake's School. The change is expected to take place about March 1st, and is being looked forward to with anticipation by all the members. The quarters will be most commodious, and, when fitted up, will be the most elegant club rooms in the city.

THE ROSE JAR

SHE AND I.—JAMES BERRY BENSEL, LOVER'S YEAR BOOK (ROBERTS).

AND I said, "She is dead; I could not brook Again on that marvelous face to look."
But they took my hand and they led me in,
And left me alone with my nearest kin.
Once again in that silent place,
My beautiful and I, face to face.
And I could not speak, and I could not stir,
But I stood, and with love I looked on her.
With love and with rapture and strange surprise
I looked on the lips and the close-shut eyes;
On the perfect rest and the calm content
And the happiness in her features blent,
And the thin white hands that had wrought so much,
Now nerveless to kisses or fevered touch,—
My beautiful dead who had known the strife,
The pain and the sorrow that we call life,
Who had never faltered beneath her cross,
Nor murmured when loss followed swift on loss.
And the smile that sweetened her lips away
Lay light on her heaven-closed mouth that day.
I smoothed from her hair a silver thread,
And I wept, but could not think her dead.
I felt, with a wonder too deep for speech,
She could tell what only the angels teach.
And down over her mouth I leaned my ear,
Lest there might be something I should not hear.
Then out of the silence between us stole
A message that reached to my inmost soul.
"Why weep you to-day who have wept before
That the journey was rough I must travel o'er?"
"Why mourn that my lips can answer you not When anguish and sorrow are both forgot?"
"Behold, all my life I have longed for rest,— Yea, e'en when I held you upon my breast."
"And now that I lie in a breathless sleep, Instead of rejoicing you sigh and weep."
"My dearest, I know that you would not break—
If you could—my slumber and have me wake."
"For though life was full of the things that hless,
I have never till now known happiness.
Then I dried my tears, and with lifted head
I left my mother, my beautiful dead."

BALLAD OF BLIND LOVE.—ANDREW LANG.

Who have loved and ceased to love, forget
That ever they loved in their lives, they say;
Only remember the fever and fret,
And the pain of love, that was all the pay;
All the delight of him passes away
From the hearts that hoped, and from lips that met—
Too late did I love you, my love, and yet
I shall never forget to my dying day.
Too late were we ware of the secret net
That meshes the feet in the flowers that stray,
There were we taken and snared, my pet,
In the dungeon of "la fausse amitie";
Help there was none in the wide world's fray.
Joy was there none in the gift and the debt;
Too late we knew it, too long regret—
I shall never forget to my dying day.
We must live our lives, though the sun be set,
Must meet in the masque where parts we play,
Must cross in the maze of life's minuet;
Onr yea is yea, and our nay is nay;
But while snows of winter, flowers of May
Are the sad year's shroud or coronet,
In the season of rose or of violet,
I shall never forget to my dying day.

ENVOY.

Queen, when the clay is my coverlet,
When I am dead, and when you are gray,
Vow, when the grass of the grave is wet,
"I shall never forget to my dying day."

THE WAY OF THE CROSS.

HARKN to the Master's voice so sweetly calling:
 Come, follow Me
 O'er the dim moorland where the dews are falling,
 O'er hill a, d lea,
 Forsake, for Me, the dear, familiar faces,
 Thy father's house, thy cherished sheltered places;
 Out in the stormy night,
 Far from the warmth and light,
 I have a Cross for thee.

Arise—for in the East the dawn is breaking—
 And come away:
 My burden on thy shoulders meekly taking,
 Nor even stay
 To kiss once more, through blinding tears, thy dearest,
 To clasp, with bleeding, breaking heart, thy nearest,
 Hands must unloose their hold,
 Earth's joys grow faint and cold—
 I will be all to thee.

Have I not trod life's bitter road before thee
 With bleeding feet,
 Bearing alone the Cross that shineth o'er thee
 With message sweet?
 For thy sake have I wandered, faint and weary,
 Through crowded city ways and deserts dreary,
 High on the mountain bare,
 Through the long nights of prayer
 Have I not thought of thee?

When night is darkest and the way seems longest,
 Press onward, still
 Striving, in thickest fight where foes are strongest,
 To do My will,
 Look not behind thee to thy soul's undoing;
 Urge on thy footsteps—"faint, yet still pursuing."
 When waves above thee close
 Whisper to me thy woes—
 Am I not near to thee?

'Tis but a little while, and then the dawning
 When I will come,
 In the bright sunrise of eternal morning,
 To call thee home.
 If thou hast followed me through gloom and sadness,
 Shall I not comfort thee with joy and gladness?
 When life's dark days are o'er,
 There, on the shining shore,
 I have a Crown for thee.

GEORGE BING.

OBITUARY.

M. B. MORAGHAN, who expired at his residence, 431 Ridley street, a few days ago, was one of San Francisco's leading business men. He came to California in 1865, and opened a restaurant in the California Market. His indomitable energy and enterprise caused him to succeed, and he soon built up for himself a large and valuable business. He owned several large tracts of tide lands in the neighborhood of San Bruno, and established there some of the best paying oyster beds in the country. His oysters are sought for everywhere, and are the most luscious on the market. At the time of his death, Mr. Moraghan was 52 years of age. The funeral services were held at the Masobic Temple under the auspices of Excelsior Lodge, No. 166, of which the deceased was a member.

Captain Thorn, who expired in Alameda, on the 16th inst., came to California in the days of '49, and followed the sea as a profession, as a captain of steamers, for many years. For a number of years he was captain of a ferry steamer on the broad-gauge line of the Southern Pacific Company, but retired from active service some years ago. The deceased will long be remembered for his genial disposition and many sterling qualities.

THE ART EPIUREAN.

"BUT civilized man cannot live without cooks." Tut, tut, Lord Lytton! Let me whisper a word in your ear. If a San Francisco club man were cast away upon a desert island, with soft-shell crabs cuddling up and trying to be sociable while the close-mouthed oyster turned in its bed at the intruder, that particular civilized man could live well without cooks, for, mark you, there are epicures in this city who can make a poem out of a ragout, a dream from a chafing dish. He feeds, and feeds well, because he dines understandingly, an art which, to be mastered, must involve a knowledge of detail in preparation. It is not a rare occurrence for a clubman of San Francisco to go to his steward, take him aside and talk as earnestly to him as if he were a candidate buttonholing a politician during "the late unpleasantness." The steward preserves a discreet, attentive look, and withal a respectful admiration, as who should say, "There's a man who understands the beauty of dining." And the club chefs—they fairly flutter with gratified pride when the sleek, rosy-eared, doubled-chinned club man penetrates to their preserves and talks understandingly to them of sauces and simmerings. They have the soul of artists. Why even Joseph, the famous imported chef of Vanderbilt, confided to a San Francisco man that all the Vanderbilt salary was no inducement for him to remain with the family because they did not understand eating, and could not appreciate his efforts; and so he folded up his little caps and aprons and took passage back to beloved Paris, where he might perhaps get francs where on this side he received dollars, but with the francs come appreciation, the sine qua non of his artist soul, and he no longer pines in our uncongenial atmosphere.

The "lean and hungry look" is not prevalent among the club men of this city; built instead are they like the jolly monks of the artists' pencil—wide of girth, not, indeed, like the ascetic brother, cadaverous and angular—fancy his knowing the difference between turbot and turtle, burgundy and beer! And this leads to a feminine deduction. The San Francisco club man is a contented biped. Why? He is often limited to single blessedness, yet he does not allow meditation upon his lonely lot to gnaw upon his damask cheek, or, Prometheus-like, give up his vitals for its delectation. He has a better use for this necessary portion of his being. Instead, he envelopes himself in a long apron, dons a cook's cap, and, with a bottle of le bon gout in one hand and a broiler in the other, bids defiance to the blues, scoffs at sentiment and disperses doubtings by calling forth the geni of the lamp under the chafing dish. And speaking of chafing dishes, what a mine of wonders culinary can be opened up by their manipulation!

As witness to this, perhaps Mr. Frank J. Carolan, who guides the destinies of the inner man at the Burlingame Country Club, will forgive me for mentioning that, having caught him red-handed in the very act of revising the menu of the club, he was kind enough to give to the NEWS LETTER some of the possibilities lurking in that simple utensil. As to his own preference, he can cook California oysters in a dozen styles, any one of which would give him the cordons bleu in any well-regulated competition, while his lobster a la Newberg cannot be excelled, and his sweetbreads are a feast for the gods.

The sweetbreads are allowed to simmer gently—note that point; the simmering is what brings out the best that is in a chafing-dish dainty—a bit of butter having been first melted for their reception, then scramble two or three fresh eggs, using a little tomato for flavoring and some chopped green peppers. A souppon of good old Madeira to bring out the flavoring of the sweetbreads, and presto!—you have a dish that would tickle the palate of the most blazé club man. Try it yourself, and see if it's not so.

Perhaps you've been to a Bohemian Club high jinks and feel just a trifle frayed around the edges. The mere thought of a hearty breakfast is intolerable. It took Amedée Joullin's artistic soul to cope with the horns of that dilemma, and this is the breakfast that be and a kindred spirit discussed after a night of Bohemian revelry. Think of it—man, mere man, had this dainty little poem of a breakfast, and yet I wot that woman would not appreciate it, for I have yet to see the woman gourmet. What to man is regarded as an important part of the day's proceedings is too often somewhat beneath gentle woman's sovereign notice, and that's one reason why many women look so much older than their festive spouses—which is, I am aware, a slight digression from the subject in hand, but nevertheless a small excursion with a moral attached to it. Women do not as a general thing eat. They nibble. A bit here, a taste of this, a hasty drink of that, and they fancy, forsooth, that they have dined! But we were speaking of breakfast—not dinner.

This debonair artist and his friend hied them to Marchand's and ordered a simple, two-course dejeuner of fluffy scrambled eggs, young quail on toast, with a bit of salad Romaine and a rum omelet to "top off." A modest bottle of Veuve Cliquot accompanied this little feast au deux, and café noir completed it. Now a man who has wit and wisdom to evolve a breakfast like that (for he could cook as well as order it) would make his fortune as a chef should he choose to lay aside pigments and palette—cater, instead, to the palate, as it were. But to return to our muttens: Some of the NEWS LETTER's readers are wondering how that salad was made. Simplest thing in the world. For their benefit I prostrated myself, pencil in hand, before his superior knowledge, and came forth with the precious information. The Romaine leaf, be it clearly understood, is not the ordinary choux lettuce, but the long, crisp, narrow-leafed vegetable, and the leaves should never be introduced to a knife. Chicory, en passant it might be said, is the cbrysanthemum-like lettuce, and should never be used alone, as then it is bitter. This salad Romaine takes a French dressing of three tablespoonfuls of oil and one of vinegar, slowly blended, with black pepper and salt to taste. If you value your happiness, use no parsley, says Mr. Joullin. If you wish a delicate seasoning for a salad or sauté, use finis herbes, or astrigen, siboulletes, (a long, grass-like herb), chopped fine. Garlic he eschews, using in its stead the more delicate eschollets. But if these are to be our salad days, there will not be space for a description of his pet concoction, the one upon which he stakes his reputation as an artist (of the cuisine)—an asparagus omelet. It is such a simple affair, and yet so easily spoiled, for the young asparagus must be boiled only until the ends are nearly soft—just on the point of being cooked. Then have the well-beaten eggs ready to pour into the hot receptacle, in which a piece of butter is browning; cut the ends of the asparagus off, turn the eggs into the pan over a brisk fire, throw into it the asparagus tips, and let the fire and an alert eye do the rest. Salt and pepper, but as you value the success of the dish, no other seasoning, else away with that delicate asparagus flavor that euters so largely into the triumphant whole. Try that, ye whose husband is a confirmed dyspeptic, and if you work con amore, the result will cause hubby's "indigestion, that conscience of every bad stomach," to take his grip and leave. But time presses, newspaper columns are not elastic, and so I must leave a delicious terrapin concoction, confided by a Maryland man (now a Pacific-Union Clubman) for another chapter, as also a delicious salad recipe brought from the Café de la Paix by a gentleman who is authority on matters epicurean. Some of the dishes forming the menu of the inaugural dinner given to our new Mayor must also be described next time, and in the meantime polish up your chafing-dishes and practice on your pet achievements, for it's quite the fad in San Francisco now.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 30, 1897.

 54 1/2 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;

 Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

IT is admitted that many of our laws are virtually a dead-letter, but yet many members of the Legislature seem to act upon the theory that the remedy for this is more laws.

FREE wool and lessened duties on woolen goods have given the people cheaper clothing than they ever had before. There are fifty persons benefited by free wool to one who could profit by duties on foreign wool.

WRECKS in Golden Gate may be expected next month.
 The pilots are obliged to keep an eye on the State Capitol until the adjournment of the Legislature. With their watchfulness thus divided, shipping may come to grief.

IF the School Board of this city would cut off all unnecessary expenses, in the way of special teachers and the like, there would be money enough to pay the regular teachers and to keep the schools open the usual number of months in the year.

IT IS to be regretted that prize-fighting is looked upon with so much favor in Nevada that a bill has been passed permitting such brutal exhibitions. This low form of sport has been denounced from one end of the country to the other, and it is now in order to strike this most disreputable of States from the roll of the Union.

THERE is no better body of men in the Government service than our letter carriers. They work diligently and faithfully by day and by night, and are trustworthy and painstaking in fulfilling their arduous duties. We hope that Congress will recognize their services, and will vote favorably on the bill introduced for the purpose of granting them better pay.

A STOCK subject with the pulpit is that of the relation between the rich and the poor. The preachers generally condemn lavish expenditures for fashionable amusements, such as fancy dress balls, but forget that these outlays afford much needed employment to the poor. If the rich should stop spending money on superfluities, many thousands of hands would be deprived of the means of earning bread.

GREAT preparations are being made for our coming Carnival, and it behooves all persons to help it along to the best of their ability. With such an attraction visitors will come here from all over the country. Some of them may be prevailed upon to stay here, and many may have to. Money will be spent in all directions, and all California will benefit in one way or another.

THE so-called "delights of winter" in the East are for the well-to-do, who have abundance of food and clothing, comfortably-warmed dwellings, and leisure for skating, sleigh-riding and other recreations peculiar to the season. But to the needy the cold weather brings the most cruel and bitter suffering, usually intensified by the lack of sufficient food and fuel. We have in California people whom we call poor, but their condition is luxurious compared with that of the Eastern poor.

INSTEAD of wasting money on marble wainscoting for the mile and a half of corridors in the City Hall, the Commissioners should see that the floors are kept in decent condition and the passageways sufficiently lighted to enable people to find their way from one door to another.

THE English used to think the Irish question a tremendous bore, but now they groan in spirit over three Irish questions—financial reform, the demand for a Catholic University for Ireland, and the proposed Board of Agriculture. The green island may be relied upon to always keep Parliament in subjects for debate.

THE bill requiring the employment of a "specialist in sociological education," in all counties having a school attendance of 25,000, is one of the most preposterous measures ever introduced in the California Legislature.
 We might as well have specialists in psychology, penology, pathology, or embryology grafted upon our common school system. The cranks should be taught to keep their hands off the school moneys.

OVER in Alameda County a meddlesome Grand Jury is investigating the expenditure of nineteen thousand dollars last year, by the Supervisors, for the support of persons alleged to be indigent. The circumstance that it was a Presidential year makes this outlay particularly exasperating to the tax-payers. It should now be in order to make the indigent do something for the relief of the property owners.

IF reports from Chicago be true, there are vastly more people carrying revolvers in that city than the number of those so armed on all the Pacific Coast. The robber and the foot-pad make life a series of alarms for the money handlers of the big city by the lake. Despite all sensational statements to the contrary, the truth is that in no other large city of the United States are life and property more secure than in San Francisco.

IT is said that Emperor William regrets the policy of conciliation that he formerly displayed towards the German socialists, and that he has decided upon repressive measures. He is surrounded by flatterers, who encourage his disposition towards absolutism. But there are millions of socialists, and in some large cities they compose three-fifths of the voting population. The Emperor may find that holding down the safety valve of German discontent is not altogether safe.

THERE is a growing belief that our political system puts too much power in the hands of the President.
 In England, under what is termed a constitutional monarchy, Parliament is omnipotent, and the people actually rule, through their chosen representatives. Here the President often defies Congress and nullifies its acts, not infrequently when he is in opposition to undoubted public sentiment. The Constitution should be amended, so as to give Congress more control of national affairs.

SAN FRANCISCO'S debt is less than a quarter of a million, while that of New York is $110,000,000, and Boston's is $43,000,000. Among the principal cities of the United States, this is distinguished for having the smallest debt, both absolute and per capita. And only New York and Boston excel this city in the amount of wealth. Freedom from debt is a good thing, but yet we could well afford to issue bonds for sewers and other needed public improvements, so as to give posterity a just share of the burden of payment.

DIVORCES THAT DISGRACE THE COURTS.

MRS. WATSON of Alameda is now free to do as she pleases, and among the things it is sworn that she pleased to do, was to flirt with street car conductors and, in the absence of her husband, to receive male visitors that she knew to be objectionable to him. Mr. Watson, because he loved, not wisely, but too well, very naturally expressed his disapproval of conduct unbecoming in the wife of his bosom and the mother of his children. He owned a desirable residence, supplied it bountifully, was a kind father, and appears to have been an indulgent husband in all things save his wife's flirtations. He could hear much, but smirks, and smiles, and nods that are as good as winks to passing car conductors, he could not stand without remonstrance. Nor did he quite like certain pastoral visits that were always made when he was away from home. Weller Senr. gave his son Sam the very excellent advice to "hevare of the vidders, Samivel!" In view of the record San Francisco, and its environs, have made during recent years, Mr. Watson was rather wise than foolish in applying old Weller's caution to pastor's visits. It is all very well for reverend gentlemen to take an interest in the immortal souls of other men's wives, but it is no less well for them to consider the souls of the husbands, just a little bit. Moreover, every man is, or of right ought to be, lord of his own castle, and entitled to say who may, and who may not darken its portals. A good wife would no more think of disregarding the wishes of her husband in such a matter, than the average man thinks of introducing women into his home, who with or without cause, are known to be obnoxious to his wife. It is a matter in which each should, not grudgingly or reluctantly, but cheerfully, yield to the other. That clergyman best does his duty who most faithfully, and by example as well as precept, respects and sustains the authority of the head of the family. He of all men should bow to that authority, and when he does not, but rebels, and becomes a partizan in a divorce court, and helps to separate "whom God hath joined together," he forgets himself and his duty to society. Because Mr. Watson objected to the things we have indicated, he was declared "jealous" by his wife, and that by an extraordinary decision of an extraordinary Judge was held to be "extreme cruelty," entitling the woman to a divorce. Whoever heard, in real life, of the jealousy of the man she loves being a cause of "great mental anguish" to a woman? What if her flirting, or worse, failed to arouse any feeling in him at all, would he not by his indifference, cause her real mental distress? Would it not pain any true woman to think that her spouse had wearied of her and was incapable of exhibiting jealousy over her actions, and treating her with indifference? Not a doubt about it. Indeed, it is by no means an uncommon thing for wives who fear that the affections of their husbands are waning, to test the matter by what is called an "innocent flirtation." Jealousy, under such circumstances, is the sincerest form of flattery, and very dear to the female heart. Its absence would be taken, in such a case, to be downright cruelty. To declare that jealousy which a loving husband naturally feels when he sees his wife flirting with other men to be "extreme cruelty," is a monstrous misinterpretation of the statute and an outrage upon common sense.

Mr. Watson, because he was jealous—that is, because he loved his wife—is punished. How, and to what extent? By a Judge, apparently afflicted with a sort of mental strabismus, he is decreed to be "a cruel" husband, an unworthy guardian of his children, and a man to be stripped of his past savings, as well as of his future earnings. Robbed of his wife, his children, his home, his household goods and virtually held in slavery by a monthly payment of alimony, he has had taken from him pretty nearly all that renders life worth living. All this, he it remembered, without a trial by a jury of his countrymen, and, indeed, without an adequate trial of any kind. Three or four short sittings, at which the wife tells any story she pleases, and at which every little domestic molehill is exaggerated into a mountain, do not constitute a judicial investigation commensurate to the terrible consequences involved. No wonder that many thoughtful men are beginning to think that the time will come when the institution of marriage will fall into a state of innocuous desuetude.

The Slaying
of
"Little Pete."

The life and doings in this city of Fung Ching, better known as Little Pete, who was killed by two of his countrymen whilst he was sitting in a barber's chair in Chinatown on Saturday last, constitute one of the blackest pages in our municipal history. For pretty well twenty years he defied law and order, secured the protection of the police by processes easier understood than described, profited by owning opium joints, gambling dens, slave women, man murderers, smuggling outfits, alarm gongs connecting police quarters with Chinatown, and heaven only knows what other infamous and lawless devices. He was cunning, secretive, rich, powerful, and the living embodiment of about all the ways that were dark and tricks that were vain, of his own countrymen. He could raise a corruption fund in quick order, and for almost any amount. He believed that the Police Department was constituted as well as it could be, and he could always he relied upon to promptly raise any required sum to help it pass pension bills, secure court decisions that passed all understanding, to elect certain local candidates to office, and generally to further whatever he deemed the common cause. We may not say, because we cannot prove, that these contributions brought him the immunity he so long enjoyed. We have never had a Lexow Committee for this city, and therefore have never got to the bottom of things. But the broad fact stands out clear and hold enough for a wayfaring man, though a fool, to read. Little Pete was known for pretty nearly all he was, yet no harm came to him at the hands of our vigilant peace officers, and he was rarely put to any inconvenience, but when he was he always seemed to have a friend just where he needed one. It may have been that his smartness and cunning were too much for our officials, but to admit that is to concede the point that we ought long ago to have had a band of trained officers equal to at least one Chinaman.

What this city has first and last suffered, and still suffers, from the presence of Chinatown in its midst, may never be computed. It has been a festering cesspool of crime, disease, immorality, unmentionable vices, and of contamination to both old and young alike, that almost passeth human understanding. The infection is to-day deeply embedded in persons and places that are not generally suspected. No one who came into contact with Chinatown seemed to escape its infection. Even its women missionaries, in too many cases, surrendered to its habits with truly lamentable results. It is not too much to say that the long-continued existence of this abomination has in large part been due to the corrupt and corrupting influences of which this man, Little Pete, was so pronounced a master. Of course corruption existed before his day, and will continue now that he is dead, but he had made himself the Deus ex machina, and leaves no equally dangerous leader behind. If Grand Juries, District Attorneys, Police Judges, and vigilant reporters will keep a keen eye on Chinatown for a while, it may be possible to prevent the renewal of the alliances which Little Pete found so potent for evil. That such a rascally Chinaman could have worked the mischief and secured the immunity he did, must seem incredible to strangers who do not know the facts. This city has no cause to mourn the death of Little Pete.

What Is The Examiner
After Now?

It may safely be taken for granted that the Examiner's raid upon the Park Commissioners is not what it seems to be. There is a nigger in the wood pile somewhere. We do not pretend to know exactly what the facts are, but we know the Examiner and the methods it adopts under its present editorial management. It has a design upon the Park, and it cannot be a good one, because the present excellent commissioners are deemed to be in the way. They are not usable men, and, in consequence, a sudden and very extraordinary effort is being made to get rid of them. Why? Can anybody tell? There is no salary attached to their offices, and nobody is likely to hanker after their positions on that account. If Irving M. Scott, John Rosenfeldt, and Joseph Austin are not men whom no breath of scandal can hurt, then this municipality is without citizens above fear and beyond reproach. The condition of the Park speaks for itself. It is a marvel to every body, and especially to visitors from other States, that so much is accomplished at so moderate an expense. It is complained of Superintendent McLaren that he gets a full day's work out of his men in return for a full day's pay. The awful charge is also made that he sometimes borrows ideas from his subordinates. These two allegations, seriously made, furnish about as good evidence of the competency of McLaren as a superintendent as need be desired. It is further claimed that the Lodge in which he is housed is needlessly permanent and costly. He necessarily has to live in the quarters assigned him by the Commissioners, and they and not he are responsible. The late W. W. Stow favored the building of a Lodge that should be a credit to the Park for all time, he approved the plans, and watched all the proceedings had in connection with it with personal care. Possessed of personal integrity never questioned, and of a judgment in such matters almost infallible, no well informed citizen will care to question the wisdom, at the mere ipse dixit of the Examiner, of what he chose to do as a Park Commissioner. Independent in mind and means, he made a hobby of improving the Park, and left our whole people indebted to him for his resultful labors. Then the audacious allegation is made that Irving M. Scott, in effect, stole $5,000 from the Park funds by collecting that much more for pumping apparatus than it was worth. Pshaw! Everybody knows that Mr. Scott would rather donate that amount to the Park than take one dime from it to which he was not entitled. Mr. Scott has not time to go mousing around on little looting expeditions, but he may find time to defend his honor, by forcing the Examiner into the position of admitting that it cannot prove its words. It would not be true to its record if it did not take water, beg for mercy, and whine like a whipped cur. Stewart Menzies, of all men, was said to be in a steal by which he became possessed of the Casino building at much less than its value and it was intimated that McLaren had built a road at public expense for Menzies' private benefit. A brief explanation sufficed to put these lies at rest, but they have not been withdrawn. It is no doubt hoped that the Commissioners may be badgered into resigning their positions in disgust, but that would be to play the game of the enemy. The Examiner has a design, and its methods demonstrate that it is not a good one.

Railroad Building end? The Railway Age finds that it has undergone a remarkable decline since 1887, in which year 12,983 miles of track were laid. Year by year fewer miles have been built, until last year the small total of 1802 miles was reached. The descent to extreme inactivity has been continuous throughout nine years, and it is perhaps well. The country has fully enough miles of road to supply the requirements of its present population. As a matter of fact, the United States has come by the greatest system of railroads on earth, it hardly knows how. A sum total nearly equal to all the gold and silver in the world has been borrowed to give us nearly as many miles of railroad as are owned by all the rest of creation put together. This gigantic business is to-day paying nothing on 70 per cent of its stock indebtedness, and nothing on 13 per cent of its bonds. Yet what would our country have been, for a century or more to come, if it had not been for the early building of these roads, for which there has been need, and for which there will yet be adequate profit? That the credit of so new a country was equal to what has been accomplished will always remain one of the marvels of the age. Meanwhile, the railroad builder may well take a rest. Yet he is still busy in California, which last year headed the list of States in the matter of mileage of new roads.

The Proposed Postal Improvements. Bills have passed the House of Representatives which contain changes in the postal service which will be interesting to the people generally. One is to permit the mailing of private postal cards. Under its provisions any card to which a one-cent stamp is affixed may be transmitted by mail, provided it approximates in size and weight the present card furnished by the Government. The plan has been adopted in Great Britain, and in seven months has increased the card mail by one-fourth; a very strong evidence of its popularity there. It would undoubtedly be equally so here. Business houses would use it, printing their own devices on the face, and society would make a fad of having individual cards handsomely engraved. The Government would profit by saving the expense of printing, handling and storing an immense number of the present cards.

Another proposal is that senders or owners of registered letters, which are lost, may be indemnified to the amount of ten dollars. Sums registered under ten dollars, if lost, would be repaid in full. Probably the majority of people who patronize the Registry department believe that the Government is responsible for the money thus sent by mail. Such is not the fact. The additional eight cents on a registered letter purchases nothing but extra care in its transmission. Registered letters are handled separately from the ordinary mail and can be traced from sender to receiver, but the mere fact of registration points the evilly-inclined to the letters where the most value is to be found. Under the plan of a limited indemnification it is expected that the increased use of registry will be sufficient to make the department whole against any sums it may be called upon to repay.

The postal authorities are also experimenting with a plan which makes the individual his own postmaster. If approved, a little cabinet, costing about two dollars, may be purchased from the department and fastened outside one's front door. The cabinet will have one compartment in which the carrier will place letters which he is delivering; another in which he will find letters to be mailed. If the householder has no stamps, he may put the money to buy them in the box with the letters, and the carrier will do the rest. Still another compartment is for the purpose of buying stamps. Money is placed in the box, and an indicator tells the carrier just what stamps are required. He takes the money and leaves the stamps on his succeeding trip. The amount that can be purchased at any one time will not exceed fifty cents. Soon a man may not need to leave his house for any purpose, and later on, perhaps, he may be served with all necessities while in bed.

The Arbitration Treaty in Danger. It is obvious that the arbitration treaty is in imminent peril. The small men whom the poor politics of the period have brought to the surface as United States Senators, are beating the bush for all sort of excuses for delay and its ultimate defeat. It is now in committee and is not apparently to be reported back to the Senate this session. Meanwhile, the Irish societies all over the country are being moved to petition for its rejection on all sorts of grounds, most of which go straight to the point that it is not desirable that this country should be without grievances against Great Britain, or debarred from making war against the people of that nation whenever popular clamor can be aroused to demand it, or their European complications seem to afford us the usual opportunity for successful attack. That is plainly the intent and meaning of an avalanche of memorials now descending upon the Senate, which, by its non-action, seems to invite them, and to desire nothing better. If this issue is unhappily to be raised at all, it is better that it should be raised now than later. Let us comprehend, once for all, just where we stand. If we are to live in a condition of perpetual unrest and threatening turmoil with the people of our own race, kindred and language across the ocean, let us know it, and learn at whose instance, and for what cause this unsatisfactory state of affairs is to be maintained. The NEWS LETTER has no taste for religious, or racial controversies, and usually leaves them severely alone. It believes that the newer and better issues constantly arising in this great country supply all the food for thought that our people require or can digest. Our domestic difficulties are enough in all conscience, without participating in foreign antipathies in which we have no sort of interest. If any section, race, or creed, less than a majority of the whole American people, believes that it can force the United States to maintain a standing army, and a Navy of the first class, in order to fight causeless and preventable wars, we believe that it has but to show its hand in order to learn how grievously mistaken it is. The arbitration treaty is a beneficent measure, approved by the best American thought, and demanded by enlightened public sentiment.

The Pacific Railroad Debts. The best journals of the East are most pronounced in their views of the unwisdom of Congress in not either passing the Funding Bill or devising some satisfactory settlement of the Pacific Railroad debts. The New York Nation, and Springfield Republican, fairly represent the independent class of newspapers to which we refer. The Nation in its own clear and forceful way says, that "in lieu of funding, foreclosure is the only remaining alternative. But that would imply, in the first place, an issue of $60,000,000 in bonds with which to pay off the first mortgage, and, in the second place, Government ownership and operation of the road. But we all know how very bad it is to issue bonds, and we can guess how bad it would be for a Government to run a railroad. It is perfectly certain that every prominent constituent would have to have a pass, and a position on the road for his son, and get his freight carried free. Congress can seriously contemplate neither bond issues on account of the road, nor its operation by the Government. The only inference is that it has shirked, and means to go on shirking its duty to settle the question. It is the same old policy of drift. Drifting is good fun and very easy, but in the end the ship goes to smash on the rocks. However, you may always hope to be dead and well out of it first." That is pretty much the view the NEWS LETTER has always taken of this matter. The troubles that funding involves a complicated financial transaction for which Congress at present has neither a mind or taste of its own, and is without confidence in anybody who has. Then there is an enviable opportunity to pose in public as an enemy of corporations and bloodsuckers. Add to this, the inertia and cowardice of a short session on the eve of a new administration, and the shirking by Congress of a difficult and perhaps unpopular duty, is fully accounted for. But the Pacific Railroads' debt problem has got to be solved in some way, and that way will not be found by the Government embarking in the railroad business. Meanwhile, foreclosure proceedings will drag their slow way along in the Courts, and the end no man may foresee. It will be well if no paralysis falls upon the commerce of this Coast in consequence.

Renewed Interest in Ramie Fibre. The English are now engaged in experiments that have a decided interest for the textile trade everywhere. Every reader will remember the incessant talk in the papers a few years since, regarding the value of the ramie fibre, and how confidently it was expected to become a serious rival of both cotton and flax. The French worked on ramie before the Americans took it up. The French gave it up, and even the ingenuity of Americans failed, and the subject dropped. Now the English have the ramie fever, and already claim that success is just ahead. The great difficulty to overcome in the preparation of the fibre is to disengage it from the gummy bark of the plant. The method is necessarily a chemical one, and both French and Americans failed to find an agent that would dissolve the gum without weakening the fibre. There has been no trouble to separate the fibre, but it was always found too much rotted by chemicals to use in cloth. The English are using a method employing the zincate of soda, lately originated for them by a chemist of Indian nativity. A company has been formed, and patents taken out in every country. An experimental factory is at work in London, turning out two tons of fibre a week ready for spinning. There has never seemed any doubt of the value of ramie, provided it could be successfully decorticated. It is a very light and very strong cloth when woven, and will not shrink or stretch. It can be sold almost as cheap as the cheapest cotton, and yet its smooth and glossy appearance rivals linen. Six pounds of ramie will make as much sail-cloth as ten pounds of flax. The canvas of the famous yacht Defender was made from this fibre. The plant is tropical, and has been known to produce four crops a year. If the claims of success are well founded, we shall doubtless see the enterprise founded in this country. Texas is known to be an excellent climate for the production of the plant, and Southern California may prove to be just as good. All that the planter has to guard against is the fermentation of the gum in the bark before he delivers it to the factory.

The Cabinet Taking Form. The indications are that President-elect McKinley is at last progressing with his cabinet making. As John Sherman has himself announced the fact, there remains no doubt that he is to be the new Secretary of State. A stronger man than his chief, he will, we think, be the guiding star of, and give complexion to the new administration. And a very quiet, sober, sedate hue it will be. For many years past John Sherman has been the most temporizing, conservative man in Congress. He will carry nothing of jingo policy into our relations with foreign nations, and that is well, for the country needs nothing so much at this time as assurances of peace, to the end that prosperity may be permitted to resume its normal sway. The new Secretary will be quiet, dignified and inclined to smooth away difficulties and the President-elect, not being a Cleveland, will give him a free hand and let him have his own way. Unless the unexpected should happen, our foreign relations will not trouble us overmuch during the next four years. Judge Nathan Goff, of West Virginia, is to be the Attorney General, and he too, is a safe, rather than a brilliant man. Our own Judge McKenna appears to have been slated for Secretary of the Interior. In him California will have a creditable representative, and the country a most painstaking and conscientious cabinet officer. Probably no better selection from this Coast could have been made. He will devote himself to mastering the affairs of his office, and will administer them with marked executive ability. The leading idea which seems to have dictated these cabinet selections, is that strength and solidity, rather than brilliancy, should form the distinguishing characteristics of this administration. Political pyrotechnics are likely to be at a discount for some time to come.

An Outline Of McKinley's Policy. What may be accepted as an accurate statement of the main features of the next administration's financial policy appears over the signature of E. V. Smalley of Minneapolis, who has been having a talk with the President-elect. There will be: (1) An immediate revision of the tariff on protection lines, (2) The restoration of the reciprocity treaties of the Harrison administration, (3) The maintenance of all kinds of money at a parity with gold, (4) Efforts in the direction of promoting international bi-metallicism, (5) The gradual retirement of the greenbacks by the use of surplus revenue for that purpose, (6) An extension of the National Bank system, so as to permit of branches being carried on in small towns, (7) Economy in expenditures, if Congress will permit, to correspond with the economies of the period consequent upon the condition of the times. This is a modest programme that has little or no meaning in it, except as to the tariff. The restoration of the reciprocity arrangements is now next to impossible, for the reason that nothing is left to trade with. The sugar duties cannot again be spared; besides our cane and beet growers would object to free trade in sugar, and bounties are now impossible. The greenback policy will have no immediate effect, as it will be long before there will be any surplus revenue to speak of. The old McKinley tariff with a few changes will be re-enacted, and an extra session called for the purpose. This is due to the industries that supplied the campaign fund. For the rest the programme amounts to nothing, and that, perhaps, is well. The country, with a rest from politics, will stick the better to business.

To Inconvenience The Public. A Bill is at present before the Legislature, the tenor of which is to compel the Pullman Company to leave up all upper berths when the same are not occupied. This bill is one of the worst to crop up this session and if passed would prove a great inconvenience to passengers and deprive them of the little comfort they may obtain while travelling. At present it is customary to sell the lower berths first and if the upper berth remains unsold the passenger has the privilege and comfort of both seats. Should this bill pass, however, it will be to the advantage of the Pullman Company to sell both berths in the section before selling a second lower berth in another compartment. The bill is ridiculous, and would only inconvenience the travelling public. For this reason it should be killed.

AT THE CAPITOL.

SACRAMENTO, January 28, 1897.

WITH nearly 600 bills introduced in each house, and half the session almost over, how in the world the present session is going to get rid of the mass of business before it, is a problem that is difficult to solve. In fact, it is out of the question that all the measures can be properly considered. Then, again, there is being developed a strong desire to shirk work. Adjournments are taken early in the afternoon of each day, and in both houses the lusty-lunged members waste much time, as Demery said, "chewing the rag." But let the taxpayers be thankful that the Legislature meets only once in two years, and that the session is only sixty days in length, and that only thirty-five days yet remain. The business of the session, I prophesy, will be able to be summed up in the statement that the General Appropriation Bill and another County Government act have been passed. By the way, the Appropriation bill is practically ready now.

The sensational scene in the Assembly last week, when Chief Clerk Duckworth fainted, is still being talked about, and may prove the salvation of Duckworth's future. Conservative members think now that he was not all to blame, and the investigating committee, in whose hands the matter now is, will undoubtedly implicate several members of the Assembly along with the Chief Clerk. The punishment in store for them will probably be a reprimand and advice to not do it again. A bill fixing the number, duties, and pay of all temporary and permanent attachés will also be passed, or rather a constitutional amendment for the offices of both houses are named by constitutional provision. Assemblyman Brieling, Chairman of the Committee on Attachés and Mileage, was before the Investigating Committee the other day, and if he is as innocent a young man as his testimony would tend to show, Alameda County is a fit temporary residing place, and heaven should be his permanent home. The poor fellow knew nothing except what he was told, was suspicious of nothing, took everything for granted, and let a list of over one hundred names, with an appropriation of nearly $4,000, go through with his recommendation, simply because he thought it was regular. The Lord deliver us soon, and protect us in the future from such abiding faith.

Senator Withington, who represents, in a way, San Diego, made an "Indian" of himself in the Senate the other day, when he attempted, by resolution, to prevent members of the press from securing copies of bills from the Sergeant-at-Arms, and accused some newspaper man—unnamed—of taking nineteen or some other ridiculous number of each bill for some hinted at unlawful and wasteful purpose. He was properly "called down" by the newspaper men present, and his constituents will name his successor next election.

The Senate is going to investigate the disappearance of desks, chairs, and other furniture purchased last session. It all came about by Senator Smith's remarks on what he considered an extravagant appropriation of $597.50 to pay for a lot of new furniture for the use of some thirteen Senate Committees. The old furniture, it was stated, was being used by various State officers, whose right to possession of the same is doubtful. Senators Smith, Gillette and Dickinson are to be the investigators. After they investigate, I wonder what will occur. Most probably the appropriation will be allowed for the new furniture and the old furniture deliberately declared missing.

Leslie Blackburn, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, is wearing a beautiful gold badge presented him by his admiring friends in Alameda County.

Governor Budd has introduced a new practice. When a junketing committee makes a trip, along with them goes the Governor. This may be a good idea, but these trips cost money, and the Governor has certainly been to all the State institutions visited many times before.

Assemblyman Harry Mulerevey, of the Thirty-seventh District, San Francisco, who, by the way, is one of the few worthy members from the metropolis, has introduced a bill making the theft of a bicycle a felony. All the wheel owners in the State are in favor thereof, and it will undoubtedly pass.

Next week the selection of State Library Trustees will be made in joint assembly. They will all be Republicans, needless to say, and a clean sweep will be made in the State Library. If the clean sweep would include the private retail liquor store in the State Librarian's room, people who imagine a library is not a place for conducting a gin mill would be satisfied.

S. G. Goodhue, who represents the Fifty-second District in the Assembly, is one of the not too many men in that body who believe in looking out for the interest of the taxpayers. A strict and consistent economist, he is making a good record which it is to be hoped will be appreciated by his constituents. Except for being for twenty years a school trustee in San Mateo, where he lives, Mr. Goodhue never before held a public office, most probably because he never sought it, for in his district, where he has lived for thirty years, he has friends without number and is universally respected. Mr. Goodhue is chairman of the committee on Federal Relations, and a member of the committees on Commerce and Navigation, Manufactures and Internal Improvements, and Roads and Highways. Among the measures that Mr. Goodhue has introduced and is interested in, is a bill looking for the protection and regulation of the dairying industry; a bill protecting the forests; good roads; and favors the removal of the tax on shipping and non-compulsory pilotage.

S. G. Goodhue.

The bill appropriating $75,000 to cover a deficiency in the State Printing office will pass both Houses, despite opposition by the minority and a few of the Republicans, but will undoubtedly be vetoed by the Governor. The Governor's office and that of the State Printer are in opposite wings of the Capitol building, and this exemplifies the feeling cordiale between those officials. In the Senate, the bill may be passed over the Governor's veto, but in the Assembly the minority will fight that appropriation to the bitter end, and may, with the few Republicans aforesaid, force a compromise. They are willing to vote $30,000, the money to be used exclusively for Legislative printing. Business is dull here. The latest quotation on Assemblymen is sixty cents per dozen.

'We obey no wand but pleasure's.'—Tom Moore.

TO my mind Sudermann is Ibsen without the whiskers. In that vague colloquialism, "whiskers," I see a symbol: a something dim and tangle-threaded, bifarious adown the steep face of modernity, grotesquing, shadowing, narrowing nature.

And in the tensity of that scene where Magda finds nobility and bigness in the quiet, self-abnegation of the Rector, and the Rector sees scope and triumph and fulfillment in Magda's life, it fell upon me stronger, even than before, how vast and tangled Ibsen's whiskers are, how dense they grow between him and the world—the world he never looks full in the face, but peeks at with the corners of his eyes out over the hedges he has grown himself. Sudermann is so daringly unopinionated, so bravely unacquisitive, so inpeccably impersonal. No moral trails his play to rattle like a can from a dog's tail. He asks no question, he courts no interrogation; he gives you a pulsing picture of life with all life's contradictions and friction, and ideals and creeds and prejudices, battling one against the other as they must battle so long as mortal man prescribes what is to be beyond the frontier of his own soul.

We chafe and stifle with Magda as the old family chains narrow around her again. We pity, even justify, the proud, yearning, bigoted father, who says, "Look at this home! There is no luxury—hardly even what you call good taste—faded rugs, birchen chairs, old pictures; and yet when you see the beams of the Western sun pour through the white curtains and lie with such loving touch on the old room, does not something say to you, 'Here dwells true happiness?'" We sympathize with him, even to understanding why he would rather have had Magda come home in rags and tears. And yet Magda has but to say, "Filial love? I would like to take that dear, white head on my lap and say, 'You old child,'" and a broader, bigger ego claims our sympathy.

So it is throughout the play. Gentle sister Marie would die a thousand deaths but defy not one convention for Max, and Magda pityingly says, "The most terrible of all passions becomes in their hands a mere resigned defiance of death." The Rector feels a something pent, unexpressed in his placid, unworldly life and Magda urges him on with, "to be greater than our sins is worth more than all the purity you preach." And the big little egotism of the Privy Councillor—so character-consistent, so probable, so inevitable in this mixed world of ours—how sickly green it turns in the glare and glitter of her scorn! She is a wonderful woman, this refined vulgarian Magda, with a philosophy and an animal power which dominate everything. The softening influences of the Rector only accentuate her strength. She lays aside the light rapier of worldliness toward the last, when her heart begins to choke and she fights grimly, terribly, as the mother fights for her young, with the savage in her soul. And even to the very pride-broken death of her father she conquers, and you feel the awful justice of it all—and still there is neither glory nor content, nor aught but bitterness in the victory.

Sudermann says nothing but "Here is life, look at it. I can show it to you but I cannot explain its justice or its injustice." Nor can he, for even while the ink was wet upon his work, it moved and breathed and became a something, as Magda herself became, too strong, too big, too full of "I am I" to stay, trembling, under the parental rod. And Sudermann called this creation of his brain, this one day snatched from the life that might be yours, or mine or anybody's, "Heimath"—Home! Is it not the irony of genius?

I never expect to see a perfect performance of Magda, and I dare say no one ever has. I can imagine, in the hazy way one imagines things which are perfect to one's own satisfaction, a performance wherein there is no virtuosity, no star, but an ideal symphonic oneness. But stars have made Magda what she is in the realms of play-acting, and stars will sustain her there; and I do not think there ever will be enough ambitious actresses to make Magda herself hackneyed—as poor Camille is hackneyed—any more than there ever will be the inspiration, study and technical perfection in a supporting company to bring out that close, conflicting atmosphere the author has wedded to his work.

In Monday night's performance at the Baldwin Theatre, there were two characters realized, two characters that were truthful to Sudermann, finished in all the details of acting, and worthy companion pictures to Modjeska's famous Magda—Joseph Howarth's Major Schubert, and George Osbourne's Privy Councillor, von Keller. By his fidelity to what Sudermann unmistakably outlines as von Keller's character, and the somewhat ludicrous misunderstanding of that author by the ladies and gentlemen of the daily newspapers, Mr. Osbourne's interpretation has come in for a deal of slating—slating so far as the critics' intention go, but in reality very pretty and ingenuous compliments for Mr. Osbourne. It is the first time in several seasons that I have known Mr. Osbourne to exact from himself the very best of which he is capable. The utter commonplaceness of von Keller's appearance—which in itself makes a tragedy of his ever having been anything to Magda—the scrupulous, exasperating manner, the quiet composure of his speeches, the unspeakable contemptibility of the man—ever delicately suggested rather than laid on with gnarled eyebrows and fierce facialisms—which seem to have made Mr. Osbourne's Privy Councillor such bad acting for my colleagues, is, to my thinking, the best, and only possible true acting of the part. The makeup was faithful to Sudermann's directions, and the manner of the acting was an illumination of the lines. If the persons who wrote those trustful notices for Tuesday's papers will let go their pens for a few hours and read the play Heimath, a very good English version of which is published by Lamson, Wolfe & Co., they will find that von Keller is neither the Nelson Wheatcroft nor the Maurice Barrymore villain, but quite the sort of villain who occurs in actual life, and who does not wear his black soul on the outside so that you can measure it in the first act.

The enterprise of Al. Hayman & Co. in giving us Modjeska at this timely season is real philanthropy—so far as we are concerned—and not the least of this enterprise lay in bringing out Joseph Howarth, one of the foremost of young American actors, for leading man. Mr. Howarth's genius is ample enough to balance considerable discrepancy at the other end of the casts. It was not until after the first two acts that he got beneath the skin, so to speak, of Major Schubert, and then he realized the part to the very center, blending the gentleness, austerity, pride, and narrowness of this pitiable old man with splendid conviction. Howarth, like Modjeska, is the player born, and his art is instinctive, sensitive, and sure.

The other members of the company are not of a quality to shine in the peculiar exigencies of a Sudermann play. Sudermann is so usual to every-day life, so untheatrical, so unepigrammatic, even, that the actors must feel, and be, rather than act, in the accepted sense. Lester Lonergan almost convinced me that a young man could play Rector Weber in the early part of the play, but his mellow sonorosity became monotonous and insufficient in the big scenes. Miss Frances Jolliffe, the débutante (what would a Modjeska season be without a débutante?) played Marie very easily and prettily for a novice. What she lacks is not manner, but magnetism. Max is perhaps the least Sudermannish of all the characters; he might belong to any popular drama. Landers Stevens did well enough with Max, considering the popular view he took of him, and the popular view most people take of acting, but Landers has the misfortune to be my brother, so I doubly deplore any stilted actorial methods that may have characterized his work. Miss Hattie Foley infused large, farce-comedy comicality into Aunt Franciska, which, of course, entirely ruined that immense contrast character.

Modjeska's Magda is not new to San Francisco, and it never will be old to those of us who preserve our better appreciation through the dreary seasons of mediocrity so long as she plays it as she did this week. I have never seen Duse, but if she is all the world proclaims her, it must be that her's is like the beautiful, unostentatious art which marks Modjeska's Magda. Modjeska does not bring out the big brutal note which lies in wait for some heavy, mettlesome Magda. She does not come back to her old home with the world, the flesh, and the devil strident in her mien. Her's is a Magda of fine, febrile organism, with the spring of the woman who has lived, the vitality and animalism of a life used to freedom. And she feels the chains a thousand times heavier than they were in her girlhood. And this time, her self-wrought success, and her child arm her with a terrible justice. It is a characterization full of nervous power and imperial imagination—easy to applaud, impossible to describe.

If, as her admirers insist, Lillian Nordica was retired from the Metropolitan Opera Company by any private malice, or jealousy, or family reasons of Jean de Reszke's, I can see a superb revenge in store for the American songstress if she will take it when she gets back to New York. Let Nordica hire a hall, an orchestra, and any able-lunged tenor, and sing the Siegfried scene as she sang it for us at the Baldwin Saturday afternoon, and the Metropolis is hers; and there will be such a clamor around the walls of the Metropolitan that St. Jean and his angels will be only too glad to open wide the doors and let her in. And it will be the biggest argument ever offered in favor of American singers for American dollars.

Musical New York is at present given up to two all-absorbing questions—quiet enough in the title, but fraught with terrifying sensationalism in the discussion thereof. One is the Americans for America proposition; the other is the singableness and intelligableness of Wagner's operas. The musical journals, most notably the Musical Courier, are hot and savage upon the pampered head of Jean de Reszke, who, they claim, in the grasp of his greed and ambition, is unwilling to share either American duets or American plaudits with the singers of America. The Metropolitan's receipts have not been materially diminished by all this; nevertheless, the patriots are still zealous, and noisy, and hopeful. But the biggest strife is between the Wagnerites and the anti-Wagnerites. The latter forces, composed of the plumbers and gasfitters of the daily newspapers, are led by little Alan Dale, a most entertaining and sulphurous critic of plays and play-acting, but a blithering ass in all the clefs of music. These find nothing but dire dissonance and disturbance of the peace in Wagner's music. The composer himself they call "Demented Dick," "Veary Wagner," "Wheezy Wag," and many other chaste epithets which the small fire-cracker mind easily explodes upon those it cannot and will not understand. The Wagnerites, the long-haired soiled ones, who fume, flare, swear, sweat, and die by the Bard of Beyreuth, follow in the wake of short-haired Mr. De Koven of The World and deborair Mr. Huneker of the Musical Courier and The Advertiser. In his critical capacity, Reginald De Koven is the last man on earth you would suspect of writing comic operas. He goes to the Metropolitan accompanied by a quadrant, a compass, an encyclopedia, a German-English lexicon, and a thermometer—a most un-Worldly person, who reads very much like The Tribune. James Huneker is a cosmopolite, a classicalist, a modern, a traditionalist, an innovator, a technician, a temperamentalist: he exchanges color with his subject. Huneker is one of the few critics in America who earn their salaries: he is read—because he has nerve, and verve, and enterprise, and judgment, and wit.

If the San Francisco telegrams have not already done the work, Nordica has only to go to conquer. Of course, she made pretty little vows never to sing Brunnhilde again, but Melba is vanquished, Lehmann is passée, Reszke's relative, Letvinne is voted fourth-rate, and New York brandishes its golden horn of plenty and demands the best. Nordica will never let the opportunity go. Besides, it will be such a sweet, bitter one on Jean, who now will scarcely risk importing Ellen Gulbranson, since that Christiania matron so widely missed the mark in the Berlin performances of Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen. And then, Reszke's splendid striping Siegfried, will not get all the New York flowers.

San Francisco is perhaps the worst place this side of Oklahoma to give an authoritative verdict on a Wagnerian performance, but the immense, compelling character of blood, passion, and sound that Nordica gave the demigoddess Saturday afternoon would have wrung a laurel crown from a music hall crowd. And this meant interpretation, and interpretation is what Wagner needs to reconcile him to the short haired

ASHTON STEVENS.

Clever women are always the scarsest of vaudeville commodities. There are two at the Orpheum, and each does a stunning act. Alcide Capitaine's trapeze work and posing on a perpendicular rope are, beyond their athletic excellence, a series of beautiful, artistic pictures. Bessie Clayton is the most expert and original dancer the Orpheum has ever engaged. Next week there will be both kinds of singing on the bill—our old friend Guille, the tenor, and Ward and Curran, late of the Clipper Quartette.

The big Aladdin production comes off at the Tivoli tonight, and there will be a string of ticket-seekers extending from the box-office way round to Powell street, where the actors come from. Extravaganza is what the Tivoli patrons want just now, and extravaganza they are going to get in large, frolicsome quantities. From all promises, Aladdin is going to be the biggest feast of music and merriment the Tivolians have had in seasons. Fest has painted new scenery, Martens and Hirschfeld have written new music, Hartman has garnered new jokes, and maybe some of the other kind, and R. C. White, of She fame, has given a fin de siècle turn to the story. There will be ballets and songs and specialties, and the entire Tivoli company in the cast.

It is some time since we have had a real farce-comedy, and many persons who are eccentric enough to go to the theatre to be amused will be glad to learn that The Prodigal Father (there is a world of mirth in that title alone) opens at the Columbia Monday night.

Thursday afternoon the first symphony concert, under the direction of the new society, takes place at the Columbia. Dvorak's first symphony and Tschaiakowsky's "Marche Slave" are among the orchestral novelties. Mrs. Katherine Fleming-Hinrichs (wife of the conductor) will be the vocalist.

THE REPULSE OF THE BURGLAR.

BY JAMES CHARLTON DONALD.

THE Nicholson family was mortally afraid of burglars. Their house at Berkeley had never been robbed, but its occupants were in as constant terror of a midnight raid as if their home had been pillaged with monthly regularity. The unwritten annals of the family were replete with burglary incidents in which marauders had all but accomplished their purpose without actually forcing an entrance. Although when exposed to the cold examination of the skeptical, the groundwork of these exciting experiences had invariably proved to be nothing more tangible than noises of varying degrees of mystery, no member of the extensive Nicholson connection ever ventured to question either the genuineness of the danger or the providential character of the deliverance.

According to the Nicholson belief, burglars roamed nightly about the premises. Although the desperadoes had never reached the climax of removing valuables or even of entering the house, the members of the family were continually on the alert, expecting that their vigilance would one night circumvent a practical thief in the flesh. A succession of false alarms, unbroken by anything more serious than an inquisitive cat, a stray dog or the howling of the wind, neither lessened their fright nor decreased their anticipation of robbery.

It must not be supposed that their nightly fear cast a perpetual gloom over the lives of the Nicholsons. On the contrary, it was the source of some secret gratification. They diligently cultivated their nerves, clinging to the idea of midnight attacks with considerable comfort mingled with their timidity. It argued a measure of enviable importance, not to say aristocratic wealth, to know that their house was the center towards which all the porch-climbers and area thieves in the country were directing their covetous talents.

Mrs. Nicholson, in her easy chair beside a wood fire, reflected philosophically that sooner or later, the robbery was bound to be accomplished. The burglars, piqued by a succession of failures, would devote all their energies to the capture of her little citadel. Perhaps they would come that very Christmas Eve. It was dark enough,—just the night for a burglar's purpose.

Her available defense force was somewhat weak. Her husband was absent and the members of the household were chiefly women and children, the nearest approach to a man being her nephew Henry, who, although a well grown lad of 18, was a chronic sufferer from moral and physical cowardice.

Henry left the house early in the evening, returning about nine in a pelting rain. The family retired at the usual time and an hour or two later, Mrs. Nicholson, in spite of her quaking nerves, felt a thrill that was almost triumphant because of the accuracy of her intuition. She heard the long expected burglar. She was wide awake and there was no doubt of his presence this time. He was working with monotonous diligence and seemed to be filing away at the window fastening, keeping time to the drip, drip of the rain from the eaves.

Mrs. Nicholson aroused her niece and the female servant and held a hurried consultation to decide the best means of thwarting the burglar's plans. As a forlorn hope they called Henry, but he was not easily awakened. When he was finally made to understand the nature of the family peril, he contributed some sage advice.

"Hit him with an Indian club," Henry bravely counselled, and turning over, resumed his slumbers.

Frightened as they were of burglars, the Nicholsons were more afraid of firearms, and no active aid being obtainable from Henry, the women prepared to attack the unwelcome visitor with domestic weapons.

The burglar was at a window near the front door, hidden by the deep portico. The terrified females could hear him distinctly. Prompt action was necessary, so Mrs. Nicholson procured one of her nephew's Indian clubs and from an upper window hurled it in at the open side of the porch.

As if recoiling from the blow, a big, black object leaped from the floor of the porch but did not run away. It uttered no sound when the heavy missile fell, so the suggestion that the cause of alarm might be an enormous dog, was scouted.

"A dog would have howled," said the maid, convincingly.

The undaunted burglar crouched down again on the floor of the porch, and after an interval of silence above, apparently thinking he would be safe from further interruption, boldly renewed his rasping work at the door.

"We shall be murdered if he gets in," Mrs. Nicholson called as an ultimatum through the key hole to Henry. "We must strike a quick blow for our home and our lives."

Stimulated to action by the prospect of sudden death, Henry was finally persuaded to emerge from his retirement and assail the burglar, making the condition that the women should accompany him as a body guard. While Mrs. Nicholson remained at the upper window, Henry with a second Indian club in one hand and a cribbage board in the other, crept slowly and reluctantly down stairs, followed by his sister, armed with a manicure set and a child's bow and arrow, while the servant carried a large kitchen knife and a potato masher.

Quietly opening the front door a few inches, Henry threw club and cribbage board in the face of the intruder and bolted upstairs and into his room, upsetting in his flight the trembling girls on the landing.

Simultaneously with Henry's discharge, Mrs. Nicholson from her place of vantage, dropped two dumb bells, a slate, several hoots and a Noah's ark with its entire menagerie, upon the head of the hold thief.

This combined volley of heavy artillery knocked the robber off the porch. In the dim light, the defenders of their home could see him lying motionless on the pavement below.

Mrs. Nicholson was instantly smitten with remorse. The violent death of a human being was awful. She would always have it on her conscience, even if he were a burglar.

"I suppose it will be justifiable homicide, but, oh, dear! it's just dreadful," she wailed, wringing her hands, "and he probably wasn't ready to die."

The watchers above saw the robber leap up as if in the death agony. Then he lay rigid.

In nervous apprehension, tortured by their consciences and the fear of an undefined punishment by the law the women sorrowfully waited for the dawn, too unnerved to seek assistance, Henry, meanwhile, lying trembling in his bed. They were afraid even of a dead burglar and reluctantly allowed the corpse to remain where it lay, exposed to wind and rain.

It was a dreary watch, and at the first glimpse of daylight, Mrs. Nicholson, with a sigh of relief, dressed to go to the police station and surrender herself. Her niece and the maid prepared to accompany her.

Henry declared he would await his arrest at home. He secretly argued that it was uncertain whether he or his aunt had delivered the fatal blow. Since she was so ready to acknowledge her guilt, he, by keeping in the background, would at least not be arraigned as the chief criminal and he might even avoid all punishment.

"It is more dignified," said Mrs. Nicholson as she adjusted her bonnet before a mirror, determined to look her best even in a dungeon; "It is much more dignified to give myself up voluntarily to the authorities, than to be dragged through the streets branded as a murderer."

She was interrupted by a shout from Henry, who after reconnoitering, had rushed out and dragged indoors the remains of the robber.

"Why, it's only my old umbrella," he said, in a sudden outburst of contemptuous bravery. "The handle's broken, and the cloth's torn, so I just dropped it outside the door when I came home last night in the rain. The wind has turned it inside out."

All the Nicholsons are still at large, uncharged with murder or any other crime. They talk no more of covetous thieves, however, and the next burglar who happens that way may carry off the house without fear of molestation from its occupants.

THE Military Tournament, which closed at Madison Square Garden on Saturday night, was an event which will surely be remembered in history. It was a revelation to thousands of people who have never realized the meaning and extent of the militia work and the thorough devotion of militiamen, too often called toy soldiers, to their work. The Third Cavalrymen Regulars also opened the eyes of unaccustomed observers by their superb riding, and the cowboy and Indian of the plains styles of riding have left an ineffaceable impression. And best of all, perhaps, a very large sum has been added to the Hospital Fund for invalid militiamen, their wives and children, which Mrs. Howard Carroll and other interested and benevolent women are attempting to collect. The purpose is to establish a large ward in the Hahnemann Hospital for the State soldiers and their families. The sum has already gone beyond the ten thousand dollars at first deemed necessary.

Of California faces I have seen very few lately, perhaps because there have been suggestions of blizzards in the air when one's own four walls are so attractive that one does not care to tempt Providence by going out often. J. D. Redding has been in Philadelphia on a business trip for a few days, and has just returned to town. Mr. and Mrs. Jim Lake have also been in the Quaker City for a week, visiting Mrs. James Elverson, Jr. Sir Bache and Lady Cunard are on a visit to Lady Cunard's mother, Mrs. Tichenor, and are at the Holland House. Mr. and Mrs. George Rutledge Gibson (Miss Belden) gave a large dinner last night in honor of Charles Dana Gibson, the artist, who is a relative of the host.

Mrs. Harry Gillig is once more contemplating a European journey. She gave an interesting musicale to a few friends on Tuesday night, at which Miss Eugenie Ferrer charmed every one with her Spanish songs. She played again last night at the marriage of Miss Leona Bush to Claude de Lamontte. Miss Bush is a niece of Dr. Henna, one of New York's prominent surgeons.

By the time this letter reaches you, Miss Mollie Torbert will have been transformed into Mrs. Kirkpatrick. The wedding will be celebrated at the Church of All Angels, in West End avenue, and a reception will follow at Sherry's. The bridal pair will go South on their wedding journey. Miss Torbert has entirely recovered from her severe illness and looks like herself again. Lieutenant D. L. Tate, who came to New York to participate in the recent Military Tournament, has returned to New Hampshire with his regiment. He is still "Handsome Danny." Mrs. George Crocker gave a large dinner on Tuesday night. To-night Mrs. De La Mar will be hostess at a similar entertainment.

At the opera on Saturday afternoon, I saw Mrs. La Montague, nee Catherwood, who is more beautiful and attractive than ever. By the way, the opera was unusually interesting, as it was Calvé's second appearance as Marguerite in Faust, and the performance was a revelation. Heretofore the rôle has been sung—and sung, perhaps, with certain sentiment—but with this incomparable artist the character itself was livid before one. There are many innovations in her acting. Instead of seating herself at once when she enters the garden, and after comfortably posing as a tableau before beginning "Le Roi de Thule," she walks about—folds her little cape to put it aside—pulls out the spinning wheel and chair, singing all the while as though to herself, and ends the first verse before taking her place at the spinning wheel. It was beautifully natural. The jewel song, instead of being a mere vocalization, was an exquisite bit of acting as well. And the gradual surrender in the love scene was marked in the climax by an embrace of such abandon that it thrilled everyone. Not an opportunity was neglected throughout. I have never seen a Marguerite before, although I have heard them. Calvé's voice, too, is in perfect condition, but it is needless for me to write you of that perfect voice. There are carping ones who say that Melba's determination to leave America for a two months' rest is due not to indifference so much as it is to her anxiety at Calvé's success in one of her pet rôles. But the latter, for Melba is not a diva, but, on the contrary, a most amiable woman.

While I am on the top of the stage, I must refer to Clarissa Agnew, who is making a great bit in another sort of stage life. She is a feature of The Milk White Flag Company, and her French songs are said to be "the best that ever came over." Another laurel for California.

Many long centuries before the invention of printing, one of the wisest and shrewdest of the sons of men uttered a since almost universally known and quoted phrase, "Of making books there is no end." Though books without end still continue to appear, it is a singular fact that nowadays reading has become, to the great majority of men, an impossibility. It is one of the good things that the multiplication of journals misnamed "newspapers," and of picture books misnamed "magazines," has well-nigh taken away from us. It is true that the average man sometimes fancies that his devotion to the spoiled sheets of whitish paper that we dignify by the name of "organs" may ultimately lead him to become a reader of books; but, of course, this is an utter delusion. Nothing can be further from the truth. The newspaper-habit, if persisted in, is absolutely fatal to the formation of a taste for reading. The confirmed newspaper-fiend, accustomed to his daily drams of modern journalism, gradually and surely loses that power of concentration necessary for the profitable perusal of anything worth reading. And, even if he does now and then make a half-hearted attempt to read something, what is he likely to get hold of? Of a book? Oh, no! With all the multiplication of printers, steam-presses, and other apparent facilities for the manufacture of printed paper, books are becoming scarcer. Our friend most probably gets what he calls a book at a notion store, whither he has gone to buy "sox," or his wife brings one home as a premium on a pair of corsets or a pound of candy. But are these paper-covered monstrosities books? Far from it: they consist of a hundred or two of pages of cheap, dirty-looking, evil-smelling paper, covered with ill-formed characters, and clamped together by metal fasteners that make the gorge of every hook lover rise within him. These things being so, it is all the more gratifying to see a book occasionally. The little volume recently put forth by the Roycroft Printing Shop, and entitled "An Essay on Art and Life," is a book. It is true that it contains only ninety pages, but these are of handsome paper; the typography is beautiful and accurate, the margins are broad and adorned with quaint devices in red. Each paragraph begins with an ornamental letter, and each chapter with a character illuminated by hand. The whole production is a delight and a standing protest against the cheap and nasty things that we have always with us. The essayist draws our attention to the fact that all the highest pleasures of life, such as the contemplation of the wondrous works of Nature and the marvels of creative Art, require special aptitude and careful training for their enjoyment. It is of little avail to show to a man of untrained mind and heart a picture of Raffaele, or a church of Michael Angelo, or to put into his hands a book of Ruskin. This is to cast pearls before swine. The great majority of people are unwilling, or positively unable, to devote the attention, patience, and endurance that are necessary to the acquisition of the power to enjoy the highest pleasures. The poor, from the necessities of their daily life, cannot do so, and the rich generally render themselves impotent to enjoy any pleasures except those coarse ones which can be bought with money, and which call for no vigor of mind or attention, for no exercise of soul. But he who will give good natural endowments, time, untiring patience, and strenuous attention, to the acquisition of the power to appreciate and enjoy the highest pleasures, is sure of his reward. His sense of beauty will grow finer and keener year by year, and his soul will gradually come to resemble a perfectly attuned musical instrument. The highest æsthetic pleasures surpass all others in excellence, because they only can be enjoyed without wastefulness and hurt to one's fellow creatures. The pleasures of success and of passion are rapturous, but they always cost as much as they are worth—often more.

*"Art and Life," by Vernon Lee. Published by the Roycroft Printing Shop, East Aurora, N. Y. 1896.

After the nonsense one is accustomed to hear and read on the subject of English society, it is a pleasure to have the subject treated of by one who knows whereof he speaks. Hence our satisfaction in reading Mr. G. W. Smalley's article in the January issue of Harper's Magazine. The writer points out that the qualification for admission to London society (which is probably the most brilliant, the most splendid, and certainly the most varied to be found in the world), is not wealth nor political position, nor even rank. Very rich men, of course, are found in it, men of great political distinction, and men of high birth and rank, but none of these qualifications is of itself enough to secure for its possessor free admission to the charmed circle. Still less does presentation at Court secure the desired result, though not to have been presented may be a drawback. The candidates for admission to society must, to put it very simply, show that they are worthy of admission; they must be interesting and thoroughly au fait with the usages. As society has much to offer, it fairly enough expects that the applicant shall bring something also. As to the morality of high society, in sexual and other matters, Mr. Smalley wisely says it is impossible to know whether there are more or fewer sinners in the smartest set than there are in other sets. There are no available statistics, and, till there are, we cannot say with any degree of certainty that the morals of grocers and bagmen are a whit superior to those of earls and countesses. Mr. Smalley also warns Americans who hope to win a place in English society by the sweat of their tongues, that the English have a horror of the silver-tongued orators and professional story-tellers, who expect the company to cease talking of what interests them and listen to their efforts to win admiration. The most valuable qualities in modern society at the British metropolis are brevity of speech (the British never could abide your long-winded, single-streak talkers), lightness of touch, adaptability, self-possession without obtrusiveness, and a capacity for conforming to the prevailing note.

In November of last year, a new candidate for the favor of the San Francisco public made its appearance under the title of The Family Journal. The first issue consisted of twenty-four pages of Harper's Weekly size, with an illustrated cover designed by Theodora Holly. The cover presents to us a fair-haired, thinly-clad young woman, standing in the moonlight with her back against a tree trunk. Around her runs a border of bunches of grapes; the moon is far from round, but we hope that this is not to be attributed to the indistinctness of the maiden's vision. Inside the covers are stories by Helen Campbell, Sara Graham, Ellen Coit Elliott, William J. Neidig, W. A. Curtis, and others; articles by J. Burt Davy, Dr. F. J. Masters (the Superintendent of the Methodist Chinese Missions), and H. T. Ardley. John F. Sheehan has a page entitled "Amateur Sport," and Mae Eleanor Gates conducts a page on fashions. A department of hygiene is in the charge of Dr. D. Maclean. The price of this first issue was twenty-five cents, more than can reasonably be asked for a periodical of this size and character, when we consider that Harper's Weekly and the Illustrated News of the World are sold for ten cents. The December issue, reduced to ten cents, contains an illustrated article on "The Beachmasters of the Prihylof," by David Starr Jordan, stories by W. J. Neidig, W. J. Piatt, Mary Roberts Smith, W. A. Curtis, Sybil Gray, and others. R. K. Culver writes of "The Illustrations of a Modern Newspaper," and Joaquin Miller on "California's Corner-Stone." F. A. Lucchesi has an article on musical topics, and Gertrude Zindars one on decorative Art. While we think that the proprietors of The Family Journal have got a hard road to travel, we wish them success.

The Brooklyn Daily Eagle Almanac for 1897 contains 468 pages of closely and well printed information of the world in general, and of Brooklyn and Long Island in particular. There are also two or three maps and several plans. It is a sort of "Whitaker's Almanac" for the City of Churches, and certainly offers a great amount of matter for twenty-five cents.

THE Friday Fortnightlies are to be congratulated upon having an executive officer of so much energy as Mrs. Monroe Salisbury. The lady evidently had come to the conclusion that to gain the attendance requisite to ensure a brilliant success, novelty must be the order of the evenings, and so next in line to the military cotillion came the mask and domino party, but alas! limited to members only. However, that was easily remedied by "stepping up to the captain's office," and joining.

The return of Miss Emma Butler to our swim, fresh from her social triumphs in the East, has been a source of much pleasure to her friends, the young lady being unusually popular. Her return is the more welcome, as society's ranks are thinning in the marriage of so many of its members, and the death of Mrs. Williams will cause the withdrawal of Miss Juliette Williams therefrom for the rest of the season. Of the brides of the future, still another charming girl is added to the list in the engagement of Miss Minnie Burton, which is the last reported, and several are declared to be an assured fact, and only waiting for a special function for their announcement.

Rumor has it that Miss Lily Lawler will add the attraction of her singing to the programme for Herr Schott's concert d'adieu to take place shortly. As the eminent tenor is said to have deferred his homeward departure for the special purpose of training the young lady's voice, it surely would be nothing less than grateful for her to sing at his concert, and give her numerous friends an opportunity of judging what has been really accomplished. No doubt a crowded house will be the result.

"There is one thing to be said of our society. Cavaliers may dub us the wild and woolly West; call us crude, fast, and slangy; but if our women do overstep good form occasionally, do speak in high-pitched tones, do exhibit a slap dash familiarity of manner and speech, they at least never bring about the fearful scandals which now and then rend the social system of aristocracy in London and New York." Thus spoke a recently elected official at a leading club lately, and what he said is manifestly correct.

Each of our pretty belles is devoutly praying that the coming Prince of Flanders, who is to tour the United States, may be in San Francisco before the B'lingham season begins, "for," say these pretty creatures, "there's no show for any girl down there when the matrons get in their work." Needless to say, the prospect of a possibility of one day becoming Queen of Belgium is turning all the girls' heads. Princes are sometimes won by Yankee girls, 'tis true, but Poniatowski and Flanders are miles apart.

Mrs. Hager's much-talked-of, much-hoped-for function, still hangs fire, and nothing of a definite nature is known regarding it. At a lunch party last week, some one suggested giving the old lady a hint that the winter was passing away and her county not yet heard from.

At the reception given on the 26th inst. by Mrs. Stanford, at which 800 people were present, Max Abraham was the caterer. The affair, it goes without saying, was an unqualified success.

Sir William Booker and wife are still with us, the venerable couple finding our climate far ahead of the famed Riviera, or south of France.

On dit, it is not handsome Harry, but brother Hugh, who is to enter matrimony's devious paths in the near future.

The Deal in Giant Powder.

The motive of the advance in Giant Powder stock from $17 to $30 is still open to question, more especially when it is known that the company is loaded down with an indebtedness exceeding $200,000, equal to $10 for every share of its capital. The leverage employed was unquestionably an alleged proposition on foot to establish a compact, but these negotiations seem throughout to have been a very one-sided affair. They failed to awaken any interest in any of the other powder companies' stocks, one or two of which would be chiefly benefited by a compact. Still the touts on the street for Giant kept howling away about the arrangement which every other day was "just about to be completed," while a manipulating force applied the financial jack-screw on the market. It is evident from the petty little game going on, reminiscent of an operation in Phil Sheridan, or Lady Bryan, that some self-created Napoleon of finance must size this up for a jay town. A play of this kind can certainly not be made on the pockets of level-headed business men. The only purses vulnerable, one would suppose, would be those of wealthy old spinsters or adle-pated phantoms of the gilded male persuasion with money to burn. Investors of trust funds or the advisors of the widow and orphan will scarcely hazard an investment of the kind which bears the marks of manipulation in such a cold-blooded manner. It is now hinted on California street that talk of a compromise among the water people across the bay will next be used for inflation purposes, or a "deal," as some people might term it. The fashion is evidently catching. One thing is certain, that if this kind of game is going to continue in local stocks, the competition will bear more hardly on the gentlemen of the Pine-street house. While it may attract their clientele, it is apt to force the more conservative element among investors into safer channels, where the price of industrial stocks of the kind is regulated entirely by their earnings, and not by the manipulation of stock jobbers.

Mining Sales in 1896.

Not many weeks ago a prominent mining paper published a statement showing sales of California mining property abroad during the past year, aggregating millions. The statement was alluded to as false and misleading, in this column, and prejudicial to the interest of the industry. Since then, scarcely a day passes without some exaggerated flare up from the space fiend on the press, who seems to recognize in every new arrival a financial demi-god, loaded down with millions for disbursement among mine owners. Mining properties are dispensed of in an off-hand fashion, and each repetition of the tale adds thousands of dollars to the price. The foreign fakir with a bond extracted from some unfortunate mine owner, laboring under the delirium of millions dancing before his dazzled eyes, is pused au naturel in passing homeward, and possibly out of sight for all time in this part of the world as a bona-fide purchaser. And so it goes. Leaving France and the Continent, with a record for the year of a couple of bonds on California properties, on none of which has a dollar yet been realized outside of the promoters' elaborations, published here for effect, the official list of operations in Great Britain for 1896 is now open for investigation. During the year, 857 new mining companies were brought out there, with a nominal capital of £94,419,194, against 961 companies in 1895, capitalized for £107,387,241. California is credited in the list of companies that have published prospectuses with one solitary representative, the Mountain Copper (old Iron Mountain), capital, £1,250,000. Under the list of companies simply registered, California scores five during the twelve months, viz: Alabama, capital, £120,000; Consolidated Crown Point Gold, capital, £70,000; Linn Ridge Gold Mine, capital, £120,000; Morris Ravine Gold Mines, capital, £150,000; and the Riverside Gold Mines, capital, £50,000. This is rather a modest showing in point of the number of sales, although as much cannot be said of the capitalization. As this is about all it amounts to so far, nobody has been very badly hurt, although, in the majority of instances, the intentions of the promoters have been well meant—for their own pockets.

Experts Who Incline to Caution.

It might be added, in reference to these mining promotions that, outside of the Alabama, of unhealthy notoriety sufficient, it will be hoped, to warn off investment, the most of the properties are unknown to fame, outside of the old Crown Point, which blossoms out for the second time in public within ten years. On the previous occasion the capital asked was figured in as many pounds sterling as it is now in dollars. On this market, if offered at as many dollars as it is pounds in London, it would go a-begging until a generation crops up with no eye-teeth to cut in passing from cradle to the grave. The reason that the millions in sales reported here during the year as the willing promoters hitched on to properties of suggested merit, failed to materialize, is that the class of experts now operating here is of a higher order than usual. So far the work done by these gentlemen reflects to their credit. Quite a lot of incipient rascality has been nipped in the bud, and the inflated ideas of would-be promoters have received a set-back which will prove highly beneficial. The Union-Gold, Ilex, Josephine, and the other swindles of the past, have taught people a lesson in caution which has evidently proved profitable. The same stripe of operators are still crawling about here, but it is noticeable that while tolerated, they do not maintain the confidence of respectable experts, who very rightly consider it unsafe to have their names linked in any operation. It is a recognized fact that the rascal who would win success in financial ventures, must score early in the game and stand on velvet before the approbrium of failure attracts attention to his unenviable personality. From the day it does, his progress to the gutter may be slow, but it is as certain as the cry of "Hands off" which follows the appearance of every scheme with which his name can be connected. So far there have been more rejections of California properties on examination, than acceptances, and in nearly every case the cause has been the exorbitant price asked by the owners, who have been educated up to the belief that the average expert for foreign capital is either a knave or a fool. No matter how much this may have applied to the past, it certainly does not to the men now to the fore in the business, a fact which has dawned upon the minds of one or two property owners during the past thirty days. In the course of time we will probably get business down to a legitimate basis in California mine promotion, when the surplus steam generated by wild-eyed enthusiasm will have blown off. The mines are here all right, and investors will come in time when the "hng" is not rampant in mining circles, as he is at present.

The Strike in Con.-Virginia.

A sharp advance in the shares of the Con.-Cal.-Virginia Company followed the official announcement, made early in the week, of a new ore discovery in the old California ground. While drifting in the region of what is known as the 1550 level, a vein of very high-grade ore was encountered, assays averaging, it is said, $200 per ton. The find cannot be exploited from this point, owing to lack of facilities for handling the ore. An upraise will have to be made from the 1650 level below. This will take some time. In the meantime, activity in the market should be stimulated by the chances for an improvement at any moment, as work in this upraise progresses. Friends of the business will hope that the find will open out into ample proportions, and stir up a breeze of genuine old-time excitement on the street. As it is, there was a better tone to the market during the week, with a livelier run of business among the broking fraternity than they have had for some time past. An assessment of twenty-five cents was levied on Best & Belcher on Tuesday.

The Future Of Randsburg.

People who own locations in Randsburg continue to say that they have the biggest thing on earth. Men who go there with the intention of investment, claim that this is all in their mind's eye, and that it will be time enough for the locators to figure up their profits in the millions when they open up the ground and get water within some eighty or one hundred miles. Only a little difference of opinion, that is all.

Down Center

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil air, with you."

WHAT our British cousins will think of us when they hear that an ex-Senator amused himself by chewing the ear of a waiter remains to be seen. It is known that our Solons indulge in much talk and vituperation of other Powers when in the hallowed precincts of the Senate chamber, but that one of their useless order should so far endanger his life as to enter into combat with a waiter (a live one, not a dumbone) is beyond our comprehension. The fact will most assuredly be commented upon by the British press as a sign of the unsettled times. In extenuation we can say that Mr. Grady came from Ireland originally and Fresno lately.

WE are glad to state that the question of the Rev. Mr. Rader's orthodoxy is settled for ever, and that the allegations made against him by many up-to-date members of his congregation, accusing him of breadth in his religious views, are unwarranted and uncalled for. The gentleman in question delivered a few nights ago a lecture on "The Book of Jonah" and clearly proved to his detractors that his is still the sweet, simple faith of the eighteenth century and that he is averse to all enlightenment. Mr. Rader has apparently swallowed his conscience as easily as the whale did its Jonah.

THE last meeting of the venerable Pioneers passed off peacefully enough considering the combustible elements constituting that religious Order. Time was when free fights were in order, but that was when two or three legitimate '49ers were scattered among the members. Now that they are dead a discreet silence is maintained by those remaining, lest their right to membership be questioned. The only Pioneers we know of are not members of the Society; their self-respect keeps them out of it.

SAN FRANCISCANS should be glad that the great winds and the fogs celebrate high carnival in this city and that the softer zephyrs play about the southern portion of the State. All the one-lunged men in the world accumulate in Los Angeles and the neighboring villages, while here only the hardy and the healthy can exist. Thank God for the fog, ye Silurians and sitters on barrels. Were it not for our climate the one-lunged Easterner would run ye out of business.

ONE Charles M. Stebbins, of Boston, is seeking notoriety with a volume entitled "The New and True Religion." Along with other public benefactors, Mr. Stebbins is apparently willing to foist his wretched views on the world for the incidental remuneration of six-bits or one dollar. The TOWN CRIER holds that the man who is fortunate enough to possess the true religion should go into the wilds of Borneo and hug himself. The thing is precious.

KISSING, instead of being a capital pleasure, is considered a crime in Oakland where the stewardess of the Receiving Hospital may be fired for allegedly indulging in osculatory exercise with a gen'lum freu', and also committing other minor offenses. Were we a woman instead of a divine man, we would prefer to let the dead bury their dead rather than become a nurse if such cruel regulations went with the job.

THE announcement is made that the Greeks of this city will form a company of volunteers for service in Cuba. Judging by their names these gentlemen, all of whom are in the liquor business, suffer from the "itch" even unto torture. Death might therefore be pleasure unto them. We fear, however, their enthusiasm will die out after a few parades up and down Polk Street.

AN Oakland lady of advanced views has applied to our police for assistance in finding her husband. The TOWN CRIER suggests that the advanced one seek for him in her kitchen.

WHY fight for cheaper water while the charges for whiskey are still so exorbitant?

BACHELORS in the night houses are such they pass on their care a lesson from the evils that are befalling Thomas Quaintrel, who, pursued, even unto marriage by his former landlady. The persecutions of these ladies were formerly confined mainly to the dinner table, but now that they are attempting to force themselves into the chambre de mad., it is time for a halt to be called.

A POOR devil with a larger appreciation of humor than a share of this world's goods, was lately arrested for purloining and selling his wife's tombstone. The deceased lady can hardly have missed the ornament and tribute to her blessed memory and, more likely than not, was pleased over the theft. Her friends will no longer have a clue to her age.

IT is refreshing to know that at last there is a chance of the sewers of San Francisco being flushed and through the aid of the Supervisors. The TOWN CRIER recommends that as a first means towards achieving this desirable result, these genial gentlemen be thrown down them one and all. Heaven knows they are capable of cleaning out almost anything.

AN aged capitalist lately rejoined his wife after a mysterious absence of many years, and all in fulfillment of a dream. There must be some mistake here. The TOWN CRIER, who joined the ranks of the capitalists some years ago, unfortunately lost with the elevation in his social status the ability to indulge in dreams.

WE are not hearing much about those enemies to society, the milk-men, these days. Can it be that they have had private mains introduced into their dairies, and can thus acquire their necessary amount of Nature's sweet restorer without attracting public attention by stopping at the pumps?

THE directors of the Ebell Society have decided to maintain a dignified silence concerning the alleged blackhalling of a lady aspirant to membership. Seeing that the directors are all women, the TOWN CRIER laughs up his patched sleeve at their decision.

SHOULD the Swanhilda and her crew go down to Davy Jones's locker without our knowing of it, the detectives and other unjailed criminals of the world will come to San Francisco, and die in due time of nervousness brought on by continual expectation.

THINGS are getting decidedly hot up at Sacramento. The CRIER recommends that Martiu Kelly be sent up there with that old fire engine of his, even if the city funds are drawn upon to get him there. They will be appropriated sooner or later, anyhow.

THE Chronicle is authority for the fact that young Sir Robert Peel has written an "amazing" book. The TOWN CRIER will bet his little war club that the fellow will be "skinned" by the critics before the down appears on the lip of 1897.

THE latest weather forecaster to venture into this wild and woolly city is a gentleman of the name of Reed. It will not be long before he is shaken by the wind of public opinion.

THE Park Commissioners are to be petitioned for a bridle path in Golden Gate Park. Seeing that a Lover's Walk is there, the petition should be granted.

WE understand that Corbett and Fitzsimmons will fight in Nevada and not in Mexico. Since when, pray, has the right of free speech been denied in that country?

A NEW "coach" has been hired to look after the Stanford youths. Needless to say, the fellow's attention will be given their muscles and not their minds.

AN Italian professor is said to have discovered a cure for consumption. This probably consists of the copious use of garlic as food. Even Death draws the line at that.

ONE seldom sees a Chiuaman intoxicated, but Little Pete, with three bullets in him, may properly be said to have been loaded.

WHY all this abuse of the chewers of gum? Since the CRIER lost his teeth he has done it himself, and he is no slouch, either.

BENEATH this stone a lawyer sleeps;
Let's trust Death played with him for keeps.

BALLADE OF FORGOTTEN LOVES.—ARTHUR GRISSOM.

SOME poets sing of sweethearts dead,
Some sing of true loves far away,
Some sing of those that others wed,
And some of idols turned to clay;
I sing a pensive roundelay
To sweethearts of a doubtful lot,
The passions vanished in a day—
The little loves that I've forgot.

For, as the happy years have sped,
And golden dreams have changed to gray,
How oft the flame of love was fed
By glance or smile, from Maud or May,
When wayward Cupid was at play;
Mere fancies, formed of who knows what?
But still my debt I ne'er can pay
The little loves that I've forgot.

O joyous hours forever fled!
O sudden hope that would not stay!
Held only by the slender thread
Of memory that's all astray.
Their very names I cannot say,
Time's will is done; I know them not;
But blessings on them all, I pray—
The little loves that I've forgot.

L'ENVOI.

Sweetheart, why foolish fears betray?
Ours is the one true lovers' knot;
Note well the burden of my lay—
The little loves that I've forgot!

AT SUNSET.—MARTHA M'ULLOCH-WILLIAMS, IN GODEY'S MAGAZINE.

Send me a song at sunset,
And fill each pulsing line
With the lilt the runnel sang in June
And the sigh of the swaying pine.
The swaying pine had green young tips—
One soft caressed my cheek;
Ah! happily the water sang
The thing we dared not speak.

Send me a sigh at sunset,
A sigh for life and loss.
My heart shall hear, and whisper clear
A thousand miles across,
"In June the pine had green young tips—
But ah! beloved, remember
How clear the steadfast hue abides
In frosts of chill December!"

Send me a thought at sunset;
Straight on the level beams
It shall leap the earth and breast the sea
To color all my dreams.
Anew a golden June shall hurn
And pine-tips kiss my cheek,
What time the liltng runnel sings
The thing we dared not speak.

A PARABLE.—THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.

One went East and one went West
Across the wild sea-foam,
And both were on the self-same quest.
Now one there was who cared for naught
So stayed a home;
Yet of the three 'twas only he
Who reached the goal—by him unsought.

PARTING.—EMILY DICKINSON, IN SCRIBNER'S.

My life closed twice before its close;
It yet remains to see
If Immortality unvell
A third event to me,
So huge, so hopeless to conceive
As this that twice befell.
Parting is all we know of heaven,
And all we need of hell.

DEAR EDITH—The new sacque coats are an immense improvement on the models worn last year, the backs being more graceful with the flutings falling just in the middle, and the sleeves—a large bishop before, now a full graceful bell—have a prettier appearance and are becoming to many more figures. Some of the most elegant sacques are trimmed with a fur figaro falling in points on the fronts and going apart up the back, where they join above at the place where the fluted pleats begin. Outdoor coats and capes have collars, revers and epaulettes of fur, two kinds of the same color being often taken, and the fronts and edges are adorned with bands either put on in the same fashion or with fur buttons added.

The tailors are returning to that severity of cut characteristic of their earliest achievements as women's tailor's. The coat and skirt are now as they used to be, plain and simple, the sleeves reduced almost to the dimensions of the close-fitting coat shapes of long ago. There is no redundancy of basque. It fits close. It is neither very long nor absurdly short; its frilliness has quite disappeared; the revers are neatly shaped. The skirts are moderate in width, with the fullness kept well to the back. Concession to the prevailing craze for elaboration is apparent only in the stylish vests which accompany handsome tailor gowns.

The general tendency is to discard all stiff interlinings on the newest gowns. This does very well where one can afford a crisp taffeta silk lining in each new dress, but when this is not possible, not a few women are protesting against the use of nothing but a soft finished percaline lining, with no sort of interlining added even as a facing. They argue, and justly so, that a skirt so finished has a lank, unstylish appearance (especially if of soft wool fabric) after the so recent vogue of interlined undulating skirts with a crisp flare and a certain cachet wholly absent in a soft-lined model whose folds or breadths fall limp around the feet like those of a Quakeress. There are a number of fashionable modistes who have come to the rescue in this matter. They have made an underskirt nearly as long as the dress skirt, employing crinoline, hair cloth, moreen, etc., as may be preferred, for the foundation. This skirt can be covered with silk of some dark shades, and if well cared for will last a long time. This skirt is gored on the front and sides with a deep flounce at the bottom, and the three or four shirred or box-pleated ruffles at the back are run through the inch-wide hem at their edges with a single hand of featherbone. Worn under the dress, all the slightly flaring effect of an interlined skirt is given.

Very lovely are many of the severely cut velvet gowns made ready for the new year and all its attendant festivities. They have a regal magnificence all their own, and with but a little rare valuable lace and a very few well-selected jewels the effect of such a gown can not be surpassed. The lace need not be cut if very choice, for it is now permitted to drape it temporarily with a few deft-hidden stitches and some rich jeweled lace-pins. If these pins are real gems suitable in color and not aggressive in appearance, any number—not excessive—may be employed. The twofold advantage of this plan is that it preserves the lace intact and allows of a different arrangement from time to time. This year, not only are rich velvets in ruby, black, brown and green worn, but there are lovely pink, pale turquoise and deep peacock blues, mauve, heliotrope, yellow, gray and rose-colored shades, the most of them made extremely simple; others are elaborated with fur, lace and jeweled passementeries.

EACH morning when I leave my bed,
 And clothe me for the day's vocation,
 I wonder who is maimed or dead,
 And what new, terrible sensation
 My rapt attention will engage.
 My appetite, I'm sure, would fail me
 If, staring from the printed page,
 There were no scandal to regale me.

I feel quite disappointed when
 I find no gory tales of killing;
 No massacre of maids or men,
 Or other dread disasters thrilling.
 Between my sips of coffee, I
 Am charmed to contemplate the question
 Of wholesale crime and hutchery—
 'Tis such an aid to the digestion.

Somehow it makes my buttered toast
 Seem all the hotter when I'm reading
 A heinous and atrocious roast
 Of some poor victim. When I'm "feeding"
 I find that I my lone repast
 Cannot enjoy unless, to cheer me
 With fakes at which I gaze aghast,
 I have my morning paper near me.

On tales of faithlessness I gloat;
 With ecstasy I fairly revel
 When some one cuts another's throat.
 To get real friendly with the Devil
 There is no surer, quicker way
 Than to remain at home in quiet,
 Peruse the journals of the day
 And cram your mind with sin and riot.

What interest, profound, intense,
 What fond pursuit is mine, what pleasure
 When, in a quiver of suspense,
 I open up my printed treasure!
 My daily paper! Dearer yet
 Than all else in this world so fickle—
 A morgue report and police gazette,
 And scandal-breeder for a nickel!

The gay and dehonair gentlemen comprising the membership of the Produce Exchange are never so happy as when one member manages to obtain an advantage over another, especially if there is a little joker concealed in connection with the transaction. The Call Board men are much diverted over a twin case of this character, attributed to the close friendship of Albert Gerherding, President of the Exchange, and William Berg, "the German traveler." The story goes that Berg strolled into Gerherding's office, and, with apparent innocence, picked up the cover of an ink well, having a conical top. Berg carelessly spun it around on the desk.

"Tell you what, Al," he said, as if the idea had just occurred to him; "I'll bet you five dollars that ink cover turns the other way before it stops spinning."

"Done," unhesitatingly replied Gerherding, who is always game for a wager, but who did not think his friend was serious.

Of course the impromptu top, as it ceased to spin, gave a backward revolution.

"That's a neat trick, Billy. Learn it in Germany?" quizzed Gerherding.

Berg claimed and received the money, despite Gerherding's mild protest that it was "a job and a sure thing bet." As the President of the Produce Exchange is not more fond of the worst of a hargain than any other man on the Call Board, he did some hard thinking about that wager, which ended in his laboriously filing the conical top from the cover of his ink well. The next time Berg came in, Gerberding glanced at him in apparent abstraction.

"I had something I wanted to ask you, Billy," he said, finally. "Oh, I remember now. It was about that trick of yours. I can't do it, and I don't believe you can repeat it."

Berg turned away to hide his joy, and laughed softly to himself as he reflected on what a good thing his friend was. He wished he could share it with the hoys.

"We will make it $10 this time, if you like, Al," he said, and to this proposition Gerherding agreed.

Then Berg spun the cover again, but with dire results. The loss of the pointed top cost him the bet. Now he is denouncing Mr. Gerherding for making him the victim of a conspiracy, but he has paid up the bet and stood a good luncheon into the hargain. He has concluded that Gerherding is not such a good thing as he appears, while the latter smiles easily and jingles Berg's gold eagle, but says nothing.

"Uncle" George Bromley, James M. Hamilton, who is heir apparent to Uncle George at the Bohemian Club, and who will be "Uncle Jimmy" some day, and Hugo Toland, were spending the evening at a Pacific Avenue bome, the mistress of which is noted for her strict devotion to her rigid religious views. The three clubmen were regarded with just a trifle of suspicion in that atmosphere, and being perfectly aware of the light in which they were regarded, and fearful of infringing on the ethics of the occasion, they were on their very best behaviour. By way of diversion, the hostess produced a planchette board, which is supposed to spell answers to questions, the theory being that the mechanism operates through hypnotic influence transmitted by the persons touching the board. A number of questions had been asked by various guests and answered with due propriety by the planchette board. The clubmen were fearfully holed, although they were careful to give no indication to their hostess of their longing for the comfortable "Social Hall" of the Bohemian Club. As luck would have it, according to the affidavits of the trio, only Uncle George, Jimmie, and Hugo, had their hands on the board when the lady of the house inquired if the following day would be fine. All present fixed their eyes on the board, which slowly spelled the letters:

"G-o t-o h-e—"

Before the last word was completed, the hostess indignantly snatched up the planchette board, and disdainfully turned her back on the assembled worldlings. In vain they protested their innocence, in chorus and individually. The hostess maintained that they had been caught in flagranti delicto. Each of that unhappy trio is now distinctly persona non grata in that religious home.

The appearance of Thomas R. Bacon of the University of California is such that while his pupils admire him as a lecturer on history, they are always careful to remain at a safe distance from their instructor. This feeling of constraint is mutual, and it is said that where young women students are concerned, the formidable professor is an avowed coward. Appropos of this weakness, the University town is laughing over an episode related by a young "co-ed." who was unable, through sickness, to take the Christmas examination in ancient history, and who therefore arranged for a supplemental examination on the resumption of class work at the beginning of the present term. At the appointed hour she repaired to the history class room and met Professor Bacon on the steps, preparing to go out.

"Oh, I came for my examination in ancient history," she said, in answer to Bacon's look of inquiry.

As she spoke, the Professor ran quickly down the steps.

"Yes, I remember," he said, over his shoulder. "When did the Pilgrims land?"

Without waiting for a reply, he continued his flight, and as he turned the corner of the building he shouted back:

"That's all right. You pass."

Applications for rooms at the Hotel Rafael are being received thus early by mine host Warfield from some of our swagger set, and present appearances indicate that quite a fashionable coterie will be in residence at that favorite place during the Lenten season so rapidly approaching, to recuperate from society dissipations and be "fit" for the summer gaieties.

Great reductions in fashionable furnishing goods at John W. Carmany's, 25 Kearny St.

With a laudable endeavor to thoroughly accomplish whatever he undertakes, Hancock Banning, a gay and rollicking young hinde of Los Angeles, has been here for several days, successfully engaged in an attempt at painting the town a bright and glowing cardinal hue. Accompanied by a choice escort, he traversed the entire cocktail route one night. While in a saloon noted chiefly for its elaborate practical jokes, Banning had his knuckles sharply rapped when he tried to pick up his glass, and then enjoyed the delightful experience of having the floor sink beneath his feet when he attempted to examine a picture. Every one laughed except Hancock, who, in spite of many drinks, thirsted for revenge. When the Los Angeleno said he saw the barkeeper touch a spring which caused a carved post to violently bump the back of the Banning head, all present assured him his impression was due to his alcohol-heated imagination. The victim was not at all impressed by the explanation, but he feigned acquiescence.

"Got 'em again, have I?" he yelled, in assumed terror. Then in a pretended paroxysm, he assaulted the barkeeper and his friends in turn, and under cover of his affected delirium, administered much deserved castigation to the practical jokers. Before Hancock "recovered," the clothing of the entire party was in a lamentable condition, and the saloon suggested the wreck of a gasoline schooner. But Banning is serenely conscious that he has, by the episode, earned an immunity from practical jokes in the future, so he paid for the broken glassware and damaged decorations with a light heart, if with a similarly weighted purse.

Appropos of the trial of J. J. Cooney, formerly a Notary Public, on the charge of perjury based on the alleged printer's date marks of a notarial certificate, the story has been revived of how the late A. A. Cohen secured his start in life. Cohen was a struggling law student in England and articulated as a clerk to a firm of attorneys. A famous will trial was in progress in London involving the disposition of a vast estate. Everyone believed the will a forgery but no one had been able to secure any direct proof of its lack of authenticity. The will had been offered for probate twice to the Court and at the final hearing of the case, all possible points against it had been made, but the objections were ineffectual and the spurious will was about to be accepted. Young Cohen's employers were opposed to the fraudulent will and in a moment of abstraction, the clerk held the document up to the light, saw the date mark and noted that it was subsequent to the date of the alleged will. There was no difficulty then in securing the rejection of the bogus document. For his lucky and accidental service, young Cohen was paid five thousand pounds. He came to California and with his reward laid the foundation of the fortune which enabled him to build railroads, buy lands and amass an estate of several millions.

As everybody who has sojourned in the saintly city of Sacramento knows, there is an ordinance there which prohibits men from expectorating on the sidewalks or in public places. There is also a law which exempts Legislators from being arrested fifteen days prior to, during, or fifteen days after the sitting of Legislature. A few days ago, an eminent divine from this city was walking along one of the main streets, when he had occasion to clear his throat of some phlegm located there. This he proceeded to do, but was immediately pounced upon by a zealous policeman. While being yanked off to the judgment seat he espied a man literally cover a store window with a stream of offensive tobacco juice.

"Look at that!" he cried to his capturer. "Why don't you take him too?"

"Shure, an he's only an Assimbleyman," answered the policeman. And the clergyman regrets now that he missed his vocation.

SCIENTIFIC & USEFUL

FIRST ENGLISH NEWSPAPER.—During the reign of James I., England's first newspaper was born, May, 1622, seeing the first issue of the Weekly News. Notwithstanding that it was illy received, its editor, Nathaniel Butter, lived by the business for eighteen years. The venture was the outgrowth of a custom among the country gentlemen to pay some writer in London for "news letters," and Mr. Butter's brave attempt was merely the printing regularly for the general public that which before had been written in a desultory manner for the private individual.

COPPER PENNIES.—There are 119,000,000 old copper pennies somewhere. Nobody knows what has become of them, except once in a while a single specimen turns up in change. A few years ago 4,500,000 bronze two-cent pieces were set afloat. Three millions of these are still outstanding. Three million three-cent nickel pieces are scattered over the United States, but it is very rarely that one is seen.

ASBESTOS AND PORCELAIN.—A French chemist has obtained from asbestos a substance closely resembling porcelain. The fibers of asbestos are very fine and that substance may be ground into an almost impalpable powder. This is made into paste with water, thoroughly kneaded and molded into the required form. It is then heated in crucibles to 2,500 degrees Fahrenheit. The result is a ware with the translucency of porcelain.

SAWDUST FOR FEED.—Sawdust is turned into transportable fuel in Germany by a very simple process. It is heated under high steam pressure until the resinous ingredients become sticky, when it is pressed into bricks. One man, with a two-horse power machine, can turn out 9,000 bricks a day.

POISON IVY.—Poison ivy is said to be antidoted by the brook balsam, spotted touch-me-not, or jewel weed (Impatiens fulva), which grows freely in this latitude along the banks of brooks. Its leaves and stems are bruised and applied as a poultice to the inflamed parts.

CORK FOR PAVEMENTS.—Some of the pavement in use on the streets of Vienna is composed of granulated cork mixed with asphalt and other cohesive substances. It is compressed into blocks of convenient size. Its advantages are cleanliness, durability and economy.

CONCERNING WEEKS.—The Greeks and Romans had no weeks until they borrowed this division of time from the East. The Greeks divided the months into three equal periods; the Romans into three very unequal—the Kalends, Ides and Nones.

SEA SIGNALING BY FLAGS.—The flags to be hoisted at one time in signaling at sea never exceed four. It is an interesting arithmetical fact that, with eighteen various colored flags, and never more than four at a time, no fewer than 78,642 signals can be given.

LONGEST TELEPHONE COMMUNICATION.—The longest commercial distance at which the long-distance telephone is now operated is from Boston to St. Louis, a distance of 1,400 miles. This line is more than twice as long as any European telephone line.

SALT IN THE SEA.—Every ton of Atlantic water, when evaporated, yields 81 pounds of salt; a ton of Pacific water, 79 pounds; Arctic and Antarctic waters yield 85 pounds to the ton, and Dead Sea water, 187 pounds.

THE ORIGINAL LANGUAGES.—It is said by philologists that there are thirteen original languages, the Greek, Latin, German, Slavonic, Welsh, Biscayan, Irish, Albanian, Tartarian, Illyrian, Jazygian, Chaucian and Finnic.

A SABBATH EVE.

A GOLDEN glory lights the west—
The sun's farewell;
One chime sounds clearer than the rest—
The daytime's knell.

The eastern skies are crimsoned now
And edged with grey;
The heams that graced the mountain's brow
Have passed away.

On Alcatraz the light is lit,
The Bay is still;
And soon the truant mists will fit
O'er dell and hill.

So still the town this Sabbath night,
So calm the air,
One almost sees the angels light
Those stars up there!

HOWARD V. SUTHERLAND.

AT THE RACES.

THE finishing days of the meet of the California Jockey Club, at the track across the bay, proved as exciting and sensational as their predecessors. Occasionally you will hear some grumbling at results; but the trouble is, people do not seem to take into consideration the vast difference between the Ingleside and Emeryville courses. The Oakland course was built for speed. It has a hard foundation and a hard dressing, and plays havoc with a horse with suspicious underpinning. On the other hand, Ingleside has a spongy foundation, which is continually yielding the more the track is in use. But still with high-class horses the time will not vary much. For instance, Chartreuse, who has won a mile in 1.40½ at Ingleside, has been beaten in 1.41½ at Oakland with the same weights. McGregor has won in 1.40½ at Ingleside, and has been beaten in 1.40½ at Oakland, so the two do not vary much. The whole difference seems to be with the nags with ailments. The public should be very careful of playing horses with bad feet at Oakland.

The opening days of this week at Ingleside have been unusually exciting to the talent, who, on Tuesday last, failed to cash on a single favorite, and on Wednesday, Greyhurst and Mr. Reel, the only two out of seven, looked lonely indeed. But, withal, the sport was all that could be desired.

Secretary Leake deserves great credit for the card brought forth on Wednesday. It was no easy task to fill out seven races all at a mile and over, and the appreciation shown by the vast throng that filled every available inch of the grand stand well repaid the efforts put forth by the Association.

The following well-known turfmen are said to be behind the game: Riley Grannan, $30,000; Ed. Purser, $30,000; John Coleman, $20,000; Will Wallace, $10,000; Charley Quinn, $10,000, and lucky Dave Gideon, of Requit fame, and the owner of three Futurity winners, is $5,000 behind.

California-bred horses have won seven-tenths of the money offered by the two Associations, and California owners have won, so far, four-fifths of the money hung up in purses.

Willie Sims, the crack Eastern jockey, who rode last summer for Dwyer at Gravesend, will arrive here within the next ten days. He will ride for Lucky Baldwin, who, by the way, seems to need a good, reliable trainer more than anything else. Sims will be of inestimable value to Lucky B., as he can outride any knight of the pigskin in the United States, in a race over a distance of ground, and Baldwin's horses are nearly all bred for long distances.

THE GIFT OF THE SEA,
EMPLOYED IN PLUNGING IN BARRIERS ROOM BALLADS

THE dead child lay in the shroud,
 And the widow watched beside,
 And her mother slept, and the channel swept
 The gale in the teeth of the tide.

But the mother laughed at all,
 "I have lost my man in the sea,
 And the child is dead. Be still," she said,
 "What more can ye do to me?"

The widow watched the dead,
 And the candle guttered low,
 And she tried to sing the Passing Song
 That bids the poor soul go.

And "Mary take you now," she sang,
 "That lay against my heart."
 And "Mary smooth your crib to-night,"
 But she could not say "Depart."

Then came a cry from the sea,
 But the sea-rime blinded the glass,
 And "I heard ye nothing, mother?" she said,
 "'Tis the child that waits to pass."

And the nodding mother sighed,
 "'Tis a laughing ewe in the whin,
 For why should the christened soul cry out
 That never knew of sin?"

"O feet I have held in my hand,
 O hauds at my heart to catch;
 How should they know the road to go,
 And how should they lift the latch?"

They laid a sheet to the door,
 With the little quilt atop,
 That it might not hurt from the cold or the dirt,
 But the crying would not stop.

The widow lifted the latch
 And strained her eyes to see,
 And opened the door on the bitter shore
 To let the soul go free.

There was neither glimmer nor ghost,
 There was neither spirit nor spark,
 And "Hark ye nothing mother?" she said,
 "'Tis crying for me in the dark."

And the nodding mother sighed,
 "'Tis sorrow makes ye dull;
 Have ye yet to learn the cry of the tern,
 Or the wail of the wind-blown gull?"

"The terns are blown inland,
 The gray gull follows the plow,
 'Twas never a bird, the voice I heard;
 Oh, mother, I hear it now."

"Lie still, dear lamb, lie still;
 The child is passed from harm.
 'Tis the ache in your breast that broke your rest,
 And the feel of an empty arm."

She put her mother aside,
 "In Mary's name let be,
 For the peace of my soul I must go," she said,
 And she went to the calling sea.

In the heel of the wind-hit pier,
 When the twisted weed was piled,
 She came to the life she had missed by an hour,
 For she came to a little child.

She laid it into her breast,
 And back to her mother she came,
 But it would not feed and it would not heed,
 Though she gave it her own child's name.

And the dead child dripped on her breast,
 And her own in the shroud lay stark;
 And "God forgive us, mother," she said,
 "We let it die in the dark."

GASTRONOMY and cards were the prominent features of last week's gatherings, which may be characterized as one of the duller of the season; but that is usually said when dances are few. At Mrs. Jefferson James's, Mrs. Thomas Denigan's, and Mrs. J. P. Young's progressive euchre parties some very pretty prizes were won by the ladies who took part in the games. In the luncheon line Mrs. Kruttschnitt and Mrs. Clarence Mann were the hostesses. Among the dinners was the handsome one of Mrs. Moses Heller, whose twenty-five guests were seated at a table most elaborately decorated with roses; Miss Rose Neustadter's dinner dance of thirty young people was in honor of Miss Mattie Ehrman and Alhert Frank. The decorations were all in white and green; dancing followed the dinner, and an elaborate supper concluded the festivities; and Thos. McCaleb, the young New Yorker who is passing the winter in San Francisco, was host to a party of young people at a dinner given in the red room of the Bohemian Club, Mrs. C. A. Spreckels chaperoning the affair. There was an unusual lack of teas during the week, but the one given by Miss Frances Curry, which was in honor of Miss La Vert of New Orleans, was, in spite of the unpleasant state of the atmosphere last Saturday, a charming affair, which may also be said of the meeting of the Saturday Evening Dancing Class that night. Mr. Dupern's theatre party at the Orpheum was in compliment to the bride and groom-elect, Miss Lizzie Carroll and Will Whittier, and was followed by supper at the University Club.

This week opened with the début of Miss Frances Jolliffe at the first night of Mme. Modjeska's season at the Baldwin, and theatre parties varying in size from four to a dozen or more, were seen all over the house, and of course dainty little suppers followed the performance. Tuesday was a busy day. During the afternoon came the reception at Mrs. Stanford's, and in the evening the Goodall-Keil wedding, and the reception of the Laurel Hall Club in honor of Mrs. Lowenberg. The reception at Mrs. Stanford's was an exceedingly large one, and between the hours of four and seven o'clock the rooms were thronged with guests, who came to do honor to Bishop and Mrs. Newman, who were the guests of the occasion. Although the beautiful rooms scarcely needed any additional decoration, foliage and flowers of every hue were used in lavish profusion throughout the entire house, though roses were the blossoms chiefly in evidence. Mrs. Stanford received her guests in the India room, refreshments were served from a buffet in the banquet hall, the orchestra was stationed in the art gallery, and during the afternoon the University Glee and Mandolin Club gave a number of selections. Mrs. Stanford, who was assisted by a heavy of charming belles in her duties of hostess, wore a gown of heavy black satin and diamond ornaments. Mrs. Newman was robed in black velvet trimmed with duchesse lace.

Beethoven Hall, where the Laurel Hall Club reception was held in the evening, was very prettily dressed with flowers and potted plants, and the entertainment consisted of recitations, reading of essays and vocal music, and last of all an elaborate supper, at which many toasts were offered and wittily responded to.

But it is weddings that have been the leading features of the present week, and there have been several departures from the now rather worn out "pink and white," so favorite a nomenclature in society weddings for some time past. First came the violet wedding of Miss Serena Goodall and Hugo Keil, which was solemnized at the home of the bride on McAllister street, on Tuesday evening. The bay window in the large drawing-room to the left of the hall was the place selected for the ceremony. It was transformed into a violet bower of smilax and purple violets, held in place by broad bands of white and lavender ribbons, a lovely hell of white violets was suspended from the center and beneath it the Rev. George Walk of Trinity Church tied the nuptial knot. Smilax, carnations and beauty roses were used in profusion for the adornment of the other rooms in which were assembled the relatives and intimate friends of the contracting parties. Promptly at the hour named, Miss Nellie Boyd, who was the maid-of-honor, entered the room followed by the bride and her father, the orchestra in the hall playing the Lohengrin Chorus, and were met by the groom and his best man, his brother Edward, who awaited their coming. The bride looked very handsome in a robe of white brocaded satin, trimmed with Venetian point lace, a diamond crescent, the gift of the groom, gleamed in her hair amid the folds of her fleecy tulle veil, and she carried a hoquet of white violets. Miss Boyd's gown was of white satin, trimmed with Brussels lace, and her bouquet was of purple violets. After the couple had been made one, congratulations followed, then came an elaborate supper, after which there was dancing. The presents were exceedingly handsome, consisting of jewelry, silverware, cut glass and bric-a-brac in endless variety. Mr. and Mrs. Keil are passing their honeymoon at Coronado and upon their return will reside in Belvedere.

The second change in color was made by Miss Lizzie Carroll, who chose yellow as the hue for her wedding, which took place at the home of her mother on Van Ness Avenue, at noon on Wednesday. The limited space at the disposal of the decorators, for the house is a small one, was made the most of, and an original idea, certainly, was to have the ceremony performed beneath ripe fruit, as well as the blossoms which adorned the branches of the orange tree placed in the front parlor. Archbishop Riordan was assisted by Father Mulligan in the service which converted Miss Lizzie Carroll into Mrs. Will Whittier. The bridal robe was of white satin, trimmed with lace and orange blossoms. Miss Gertrude Carroll, as maid-of-honor, wore a costume of white mousseline de soie, and the Misses Romie Wallace and Julia Crocker, who officiated as bridesmaids, were gowned alike in yellow tulle over yellow satin. Milton Latham was the groom's best man. Following the ceremony came congratulations, and then the déjeuner was served, during which the orchestra played a selection of appropriate airs, and later in the day, which proved to be the wettest of the month, the bride and groom departed to spend the honeymoon at the ranch of the bride's uncle, Pat Murphy, near Santa Barbara, and next month Mr. and Mrs. Whittier will start on a six months' tour of Europe.

Wednesday evening's weddings were those of Miss Rose Eppinger and Dr. Sharp, and of Miss Martha Shainwald and Leopold Meyers, and a very handsome wedding took place on Thursday evening, when Miss Mattie Ehrman and Alhert Frank were married at the San Francisco Verein Club, in the presence of a large number of guests. Miss Agnes Brandenstein was maid of honor, and the Misses Olga Sutro, Martha Triest, Grace Hecht, and Ida Low were bridesmaids.

Miss Sadie Hyman and Wilfred Mack will be wedded next Wednesday evening, the ceremony to take place at the San Francisco Verein Club; the Bloomingdale-Klein and the Scott-Castle weddings are also named to take place the same date.

From Salt Lake has come the news of the marriage there this week of Miss Carrie Quinan, who was quite a figure in San Francisco society three years ago, and who was recently divorced, to Lieutenant Clement Flaglor, who is also not quite unknown in our social world.

Society has sustained a severe loss in the death of Mrs. Mary Emma Flood, widow of the late capitalist. A few days ago she contracted a severe cold, which finally developed into pneumonia, and which caused her death on Wednesday night last. Her children were at her bedside when she died. The deceased will long be remembered for her generous disposition, and for the numerous gifts of charity bestowed upon the needy.

Maybe you've forgotten how good tea can be.
Get Schilling's Best of your grocer and bring back the good old times.

Last night the Friday Fortnightlies gave another of their dances at Lunt's Hall, which, being a mask and domino party, was highly enjoyed, and but few of the members failed to put in appearance. And the fancy dress cotillion of the Entre Nous Club was danced in the Maple Hall. To-night, Mrs. Josephs gives a ball in Maple Hall at which her daughter, Miss Nellie Josephs, will make her social debut. Another society debut will take place next Saturday, when Consul and Mrs. J. Simpson will give a tea in their handsome new home on Vallejo street, for the purpose of introducing their daughter, Miss Agnes Simpson. The Pacific Dancing Club on Tuesday evening, and the Cotillon Club on Friday evening, will have dances at Odd Fellow's Hall next week.

At the Baldwin Theatre, Macbeth Monday, Tuesday and Saturday nights; Adrienne Lecouvreur Thursday night, and Marie Stuart to-night, Wednesday and Friday nights, and Saturday matinee. Modjeska's Lady Macbeth was enthusiastically greeted the last time she played here; Howarth's Macbeth is of national fame. Adrienne has tender memories for most of our play-goers, as it was this play which introduced Modjeska to the English-speaking stage, and Marie Stuart has always been a favorite role.

The Stanford Choral Association (one hundred and fifty voices), and the Apollo Choral Society, are planning to unite in giving two grand choral concerts sometime in April. One of the concerts will be given in this city and one at Stanford University. The Apollo Society will increase its membership to its full limit—one hundred and fifty voices. Singers who wish to associate themselves with a chorus of earnest students of the highest class of music, are invited to become members.

Miss Minnie Burton has returned from her visit to Fort Logan, where she has been for the last three months, and if rumor can be relied on, she will return there ere long. Though the official "announcement" has not yet been made, it no doubt will be in the very near future.

The Maria-Kip Orphanage is to be benefited by a theatrical performance next month, when Caste will be given at the Bush-street Theatre, with Miss Leila Burton and Miss Rose Hooper in the leading female parts. Frank Mathieu will also appear in the comedy.

A FINE CANVAS.

A CANVAS is at present on exhibition in the studio of Amadée Joullin, which is one of the strongest and most interesting ever painted by our local artists. The canvas depicts a young Moqui Indian brave bending over the form of a dying chief in the interior of an Indian hut. The light falls on the two forms, the one outstretched upon an Indian blanket, the other kneeling at his head. The two figures almost seem to live. The muscles and sinews of the elder man show up in strong contrast to the delicate limbs of the younger, and on his face can be seen that grim determination which will not even be conquered by death. The color in the picture is perfect. There is no attempt made at false impressionism. The artist has painted life and approaching death as it is, not as it might be. To this is probably due the silent strength of the picture.

Mr. Joullin is not a mere painter; he is an artist in the higher conception of the word. We have seen and studied his work for many years, and always find something fresh in it to admire. In his dune pictures he suggests the dreariest and coldest desolation, or the terrible sultriness of a too hot summer; in his pen and ink work he is delicate, while still being strong, and now we feel sure that he will give us a series of Indian pictures, which will not only bring him new laurels, but will also add considerably to the fame of San Francisco. We shall look forward with expectancy to the next picture. The subject is one of home interest, and has never been treated as it should be.

To use any other complexion beautifier than Camelline is to run the risk of harming your skin. This favorite and indispensable adjunct to a lady's toilet has been pronounced harmless by the most eminent physicians and chemists and its success reflects much credit upon its originators, Wakelee & Co. It has taken prizes at many exhibitions and is absolutely without a peer.

THE NEW WOMAN — TOM WASSON.

She talked with great intensity of each man's base propensity, and spoke with volubility of woman's higher plane;
 She dwelt on domesticity with mental elasticity, and said that such felicity was really quite in vain.
 With gestures oratorical and phrases metaphorical, she voiced the powers numerical that woman had untold.
 And spoke with zeal dramatical of voting systematical, and ballot-boxes spherical, votes not bought with gold.
 She said in each vicinity the doctors of divinity would come from femininity; in bloomers they would be;
 And matrons with rapidity would lose all their timidity, and no more assiniuity in Congress would we see.
 And while with such audacity she showed her great capcity, and talked with great didacity, her husband learned to sweep;
 And while with such agility she dwelt on her utility with such intense pugnacity he puts the twins to sleep.

"If there's anything I pride myself upon," said the captain of the steamship, as he peered through the fog and rang the bell for more steam, "it's the accuracy of my dead reckoning. Now, unless I am greatly mistaken, we ought to make the Point inside of five minutes." Just then the ship struck. "Ah, I thought so," coolly observed the navigator. "My reckoning was right. But there must be something wrong with the compass or the currents."

THE interesting collection at the Golden Gate Park Museum has lately been enriched by a donation consisting of sixty original water colors of birds and animals, painted by Professor W. Harring by special permission of the authorities of the London Zoölogical Gardens. Professor Harring's reputation as a painter of animals is next to that of Landseer and he was once commissioned by the Khedive of Egypt to paint his horses. The gift in question was presented to the Museum by Mr. J. L. Bardwell.

ON Thursday last, was given the first of a course of lectures at Golden Gate Hall, under the auspices of the Mercantile Library Auxiliary. Two others are to follow by Rev. Charles Wendte and Professor Charles Mills Gayley, on the 4th and 11th of February respectively. The last lecture was well attended, and much interest is taken in those to come.

THE Santa Clara Magazine, published at San Jose, will henceforth be issued as the California Review. The Santa Clara was always bright, entertaining, and forceful, and Mrs. Carrie Stevens-Walter will continue as editor of the new venture.

MANY of the messenger boys are said to be suffering from the effects of their run to the Stanford residence last Wednesday. Few of them were in proper training and the constitutions of one and all were undermined by cigarette smoking and a general participation in all sorts of vice. A dinner to the newsboys is now in order.

EXPERIENCE has taught us that when Supervisors commence to find fault with the actions of their predecessors, they are only preparing to feather their own little nests. Dr. Rottanzi's virtuous protestation against the late Board causes us to tremble visibly.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 6, 1897.

Number 6.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court; and of Chicago, 303 Boyce Building, (Front E. Morrison, Eastern Representatives), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

THE rivalry between Reno and Carson, for the big prize fight, may not be altogether edifying, but it has all the charm of frankness. The Nevadans are not Saints, but on the other hand, they are not hypocrites.

THE proposed State Board of Arbitration, for the adjustment of differences between employers and employed, would be wholly useless. It would provide sinecures for a number of politicians, and that is all it is designed to accomplish.

THE Californians of earlier days were noted for a courage that triumphed over misfortunes and disaster. In these times reverses often lead to suicide. Is not this degeneracy, so far as it goes? Blowing out one's brains is a fool's atonement for blowing in one's money.

THE great amount of "space" which the Examiner is devoting to the coming prize fight in Nevada certainly indicates a decided interest in the "event." This interest may be of a purely sporting character, or it may be of a contingent or long-green sort. Readers are free to draw their own conclusions.

NO better selection could be made than that of Chauncey Depew as Ambassador to England. He is a born diplomat, famous for all the qualities that adorn such a position, and withal a genuine American. Such a man at the Court of St. James is more potent than a treaty of arbitration to preserve the peace between the two nations.

THOSE who defend pugilism, on the ground that it is "no more brutal than foot-ball," may with equal force and conclusiveness, justify assault and battery or any other form of violence. Physical suffering and injury are but incidents or risks of manly sport; in prize-fighting the sole object of the combatants is to inflict disabling punishment.

THE same newspapers that condemn as "atrocities" the burning of Cuban villages by Spanish troops, have no words but those of praise for the insurgents who do the same thing in the province of Havana. As of old, it makes a difference whose ox is gored. News from Cuba is colored and distorted in the daily press of this country, with but small exception.

ASSEMBLYMAN Melick's libel bill should become a law. It provides that unless the plaintiff prove actual malice or want of good faith, or a failure to retract after a written demand, he shall recover as damages only such loss or injury as he shall specially allege or prove. This is no more than a reasonable measure of protection to publishers, and there can be no sound objection to it.

A NUMBER of much needed amendments to the Wright irrigation law have been submitted to the Legislature. The principle of the original measure is a good one, in so far as it enables land owners, by co-operation, to develop water for irrigation through organization and the issue of long-term bonds. But numerous abuses crept into the operation of the Wright Act, and these, it appears, are now to be remedied.

SENATOR Withington's bill to create local monopolies of the retail liquor business, under the name of the "Norwegian system," is scarcely likely to meet with much favor. The bill provides that all the profits above four per cent. shall be devoted to "objects of public benefit," but in practice the gains would be very apt to stick to the hands of the incorporators under the proposed law.

THE efficacy of oral argument has been much discussed of late, among lawyers and judges. The truth seems to be that in some cases such argument is of real value and in others not. There seems to be no merit in the proposed requirement of oral argument in all cases. The matter would better be left, as it is now, to the discretion of the parties most concerned—the lawyers and the judges.

A MOVEMENT is on foot in Brooklyn, New York, to reduce the course of study in the Girls' High School. Complaint is made that the curriculum overtaxes the strength of the pupils and impairs their health. Protests of this sort are occasionally heard in relation to the Girls' High School in this city. The tendency of American education is towards overstrain, and this cannot be too zealously guarded against.

SCIENCE and common sense unite in favor of a measure to bring about the extermination of dairy animals infected with tuberculosis. But there is no good reason why the State should compensate the owners for the destruction of such animals. A cow diseased in this way should not be regarded as of any value whatever. The very best safeguard for the public against the spread of tuberculosis among dairies is that the dairymen take all the risks of loss.

THE bill now before the Legislature granting street railway franchises on a percentage basis, met with opposition at the meeting of city officials and members of the Legislature, held last Saturday. The gentlemen rather favored outright sale of such privileges upon a cash basis. We are of opinion the percentage plan is the better one, inasmuch as, under fair regulations, it would yield an increasing return in proportion to a gain of business. In the East, the percentage basis of sale has operated with satisfactory results in municipal Government.

MILLIONS of dollars' worth of tailings have been lost by California miners through ignorance of chemical methods of saving the gold. Professor Christy, of the State University, recognized as an authority in such matters, declares that by the cyanide process tailings yielding no more than fifty cents per ton may be profitably worked. Improved chemical and other methods likewise make profitable the extraction and reduction of various low-grade ore, which, in the earlier history of the State, were considered to be too poor to be worth mining.

THE Rev. Dr. Case condemns as "infamous nonsense" the remarks of Professor Jordan relative to "religious revivals," such as those in which men "lose their self-control." For comparing this sort of emotional mania to alcoholic drunkenness, the reverend gentleman has called for the removal of "such an incompetent and dangerous personality from the Presidency of the Stanford University." In which event we beg to nominate the Rev. Dr. Case for the position, he being eminently qualified by his piety, learning, and truly scientific spirit. A less tolerant man might have suggested boiling oil as a fit punishment for the Professor, with hell fire to follow.

THE WAY TO SUPPRESS THE EVILS OF CHINATOWN.

THE way to do a thing is to do it. "How not to do it," Charles Dickens very vividly described long years ago, and about that time, it must have been, our local Police Department learnt the lesson most effectively. For more years than we care to recall, the suppression of the evils of Chinatown has been a paramount need of this city. Yet during all that time those evils received police protection and notoriously paid for it. Regular officers were time and again permitted to resign, and forthwith appointed specials, with heats in Chinatown. We never knew one of those favored specials to fail to grow rich in an incredibly short space of time, and yet they, of course, had to divide with somebody. Now and then a show of activity has been made, but it has scarcely ever amounted to anything more than the sham and make-believe it was intended to be. Opium dens exist all over Chinatown to-day; some of them are visited by white girls of respectable parentage, and their location is perfectly well known. The police know of facts in this connection that are simply too terrible to print. The first real trouble between Little Pete and the rival Tongs arose over the matter of the importation of what are sometimes called "slave women." He could get his importations landed, but his rivals in business could not. Soon the price of a Chinawoman of that class rose to figures varying from $2000 to $2500. It was an enormous sum for a Chinaman to get together, far transcending the value of a slave woman, whether a creole or mulatto, in the South in the halcyon days of slavery. The vice of the Chinese, and extreme lucrativeness of the business, may be realized by these figures, which tell their own tale. Soon the rival Tongs found a new, if not a better, way to circumvent Little Pete. By the employment of Chinese servants in white families, white women posing as teachers, and the seductive influences of money, the richer and more attractive class of Chinese traders and merchants found importations unnecessary. The facts cannot be more than hinted at. W. T. Stead, in the Pall Mall Gazette, shocked the civilized world by his plain exposure, entitled, "the maiden's tribute," yet stories can be told to-day of worse happenings in our own Chinatown. Little Pete, in the interests of his own business, tried to suppress them, and secured the assistance of the Chinese Consulate and of the Police Department. His assassination was principally due to that cause.

It may be said, as it has been said, that the police would, if they could, have suppressed the seductions, opium, gambling, murders, and other crimes of Chinatown. How came it, then, that that system of gongs from certain police quarters to Chinatown was established? How came it that when those gongs were sounded the whole of Chinatown appeared to know what was meant, and hastily closed all criminal business before an apparently exhausted squad of policemen arrived? These things are no longer secrets. How came it that the celebrated Buckley-Toohy-Burns-Spots Grand Jury was called off and compelled to reconsider its indictments? Who was it that then said "they'll never put up another Grand Jury against me," and has ever since kept his word? What did those indictments charge, whom did they name, and why were they squelched? How in the nature of things can it be compatible with police efficiency that the various Tongs have been in battle array scores of times; that hundreds of murders have been committed on the streets without anybody being tried, convicted or hanged? If the loss of their friend, Little Pete, should cause the law to be avenged this time, all right. But that will lead to the awkward inquiry as to why it has not always been similarly avenged. There is one very sure way to deal with Chinatown at present. With its vendetta in full blast, defying and defeating the civil authorities, a state of war exists. Let martial law be proclaimed within a given area, and let every highbinder be hanged on the spot. The way to do a thing is to do it. Let Governor Budd take the hint, govern his action by the obvious failure of the ordinary processes of law, issue his proclamation and follow it up with the action that would then be lawful. Such vigorous action would result in the immediate purification of that plague spot in this city. Within twenty-four hours Chinatown would be camped in Cow Hollow, if no better place could be found.

Use the Pruning Knife. The effort now being made to cut down the number of teachers on the city payroll is a step in the direction of sound economy and a practical reduction of expenditures in a useless direction. There is no right-thinking tax-payer in this city who objects to reasonable taxation for the support of the public school system; there are none who do not believe that all practical necessities of the department be maintained, and their efficiency improved. But it is an undeniable fact that the control of the department has found lodgment in the hands of the employees themselves—who very naturally are not disposed to look with meekness upon any attempt to curb their exalted ideas or curtail their impractical multiplication of departments.

We are unable to see why strict business principles should not apply in the management of the public schools as in other municipal matters. But it is noticed that the protests are louder, angrier, and more persistent, when they come from the public instructors, than when they proceed from any other direction. There is resentment all along the line whenever school directors or other officials talk of needed reforms in the schools; and now a roar of virtuous indignation goes up because the present board has under consideration the dropping of certain teachers in departments that are of questionable utility, if indeed they are not utterly frivolous and fruitless. These extending branches, which are the natural result of lax management, and easy-going, complaisant directors, are deserving of the attention of the new school board; and while it must ever be the wish of the intelligent that all possible advantage be afforded the children of San Francisco in their struggle for education, it is equally true that the original and proper practical scope of public instruction has been greatly exceeded. Let the new board pursue its proposed intent. The frills, the soft places, and the sinecures, of which there are many, should be cut off without regard to the outcry of the dismembered.

Water Rates. The Courts have laid down the rule upon which water rates are to be fixed so plainly as to leave no occasion for heated discussion as to what is to happen in that regard. The rule has been approved by the Supreme Court of the State, and, in similar cases, has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is that water, like railroad fares and freights, must permit of the collection of a sufficient sum with which to pay for betterments, operating expenses, and interest on stock and bonds. In the case of the Spring Valley Water Company it is known almost to a dime how much will be required to accomplish those purposes. The accounts of the company for the past year have just been published, and its income permitted the payment of 6 per cent dividends to its stockholders. The Examiner wants the dividends for this year cut down to 5 per cent. Disregarding, for the moment, its bad motives and cinching ways, let us consider what merit, if any, there is in its proposition. Is 5 per cent the usual rate of interest in this market for local securities? We think not. We know of no Savings Banks, or other monetary institutions, that are making loans on gilt edged securities at less than six per cent. Indeed, the loaning of money for less than seven per cent is rather the exception than the rule. Spring Valley's stock is widely held in this city. It is the favorite local investment, because of the regularity of its dividends, and the confidence reposed in the company's management. Thousands of widows, and people of moderate means, hold the stock as their only source of income. It is not a stock that can be hurt without a great outcry and without the sure and certain effect of scaling down the number of nickels taken in by the Examiner. Besides, the Courts would set aside rates based on five per cent dividends. The new rate being declared void, resort would have to be had to the existing one. What good would that do anybody? It is proposed to reduce the city's payment for the water supplied to fire hydrants one half. We had supposed that every tyro in Municipal lore understood why the charge of hydrants was increased. Reduce it, and small consumers will have to make up the difference. Keep it as it is, pay it out of the City's general tax fund, and, in that case, the big taxpayer is caught, and made to lessen the burden of the consumers.

The course of the Examiner tends to a vicious and dishonest end. It opens the door and makes more easy of attainment, results that should be desired by no good citizen. A false public opinion would become a fulcrum by which dishonest officials would be able to extort tribute from every corporation doing business in San Francisco. It would compel every corporation, as a matter of self-protection, to resort to the corrupt use of money in order to secure simple justice, and save its innocent shareholders from disaster. It would bear no relation to the individual rights or burdens of the people. The parading of lengthy petitions proves nothing. The general public mind is so constituted that it will sign almost anything without hesitation; and the lists of names presented to the Supervisors are not entitled to more weight than the paper on which they are inscribed. Similar sheets placed about the streets, demanding a cut of one-half in the price of bread, or boots, or overcoats, would without doubt be signed by every thoughtless passer-by. Those who sign the petition of which the Examiner roars so loudly, cannot have knowledge of the cost of water, and are as unfamiliar with the immense capital employed in conducting the business of the Spring Valley Company, and the continued outlay involved in making necessary improvements, as if they were inhabitants of a foreign land. The comparisons in cost of maintenance and operation of water works here and at the East, are misleading and manifestly unfair. Materials of all kinds are higher in San Francisco than they are in many Eastern cities. The single item of labor here, alone foots up an annual expenditure very greatly in excess of the Eastern rate. An army of men are constantly employed by the Spring Valley Company, and every man is paid a wage sufficient to support those dependent upon him in reasonable comfort.

The laws of the State wisely provide that invested capital employed in works of a public character shall earn a reasonable increment. As we have shown, and as is generally accepted, six per cent. is a reasonable rate within the most conservative interpretation of law. It is far less than the millions of money invested in mercantile pursuits usually earn. The mature intent of the statutes is plain, and it is warranted by the financial conditions prevailing on this Coast. It is clearly in the interest of the whole people, having a fixed and just regard for the consumer no less than it has regard for the capital invested in necessary municipal enterprises.

Remarkable Impertinence.

Restriction of undesirable immigration to this country has long been a crying necessity. The old plea of making the United States a refuge for all the stinking hordes of Europe has long since been exploded by direct friction against those "oppressed of all nations," the means of whose friends enabled them to pay a steerage passage across the Atlantic. In a thousand channels the hurtful and vicious influence of this illiteracy, crime and degradation has forced itself upon the minds and into the lives of law-abiding, tax-paying, and self-respecting men. Of all classes, only the professional politician—the Senators and Representatives of the country—have been unconscious of this great evil. Abject cowardice has kept them in safe oblivion of the rising demand for legislative relief, and closed their eyes to the fact that the greatest peril of the country lay in the continued in-pour of Europe's scum. Up to a certain point assimilation was possible, but that period has been long past, as the most careless observation of the trend of events, both political and industrial, ominously demonstrate.

Legislation protecting the products of labor has been one of the corner stones of the Republican party, but all thought of the laborer has been lost in the fear of disturbing and antagonizing the "foreign vote;" and all the place-buyers and office-hunters have dodged the question and shifted the responsibility that seemed to endanger their selfish and un-patriotic schemes. At last, however, there seems to be reasonable hope that the pickets will be so firmly planted and raised so high that the object aimed at—the exclusion of the really undesirable and dangerous foreign elements—will become an accomplished fact. That this is true finds strong corroboration in the actions of the agents of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, who have sent broadcast to their agents urgent telegrams advising them to wire "their Representatives in Congress to vote against the Immigration bill, informing him that the measure virtually means exclusion, and his vote in favor of the same will mean repudiation by his constituents and his defeat at the next election." If any further argument were required for the immediate enactment of such a law, the German Steamship agents have given it. The suggestion that the constituents of Representatives would "defeat them at the next election" if they dared to perform a plain patriotic duty, strikes us as an exhibition of impertinence beyond belief. And it develops a new and more discreditible reason for past Congressional apathy than that one of moral cowardice. Vast sums are invested in Transatlantic steamship lines, and their earnings have been largely made up of steerage traffic. Hitherto their opposition to any restrictive measure has been tempered by the miscarriage of such legislation. The present bill, however, is sweeping, and will prove effective. It will keep out the undesirable classes and prevent the influx of the multitudes that now scourge the unfortunate lands of their nativity. This touching solicitude of the German Steamship agents for the welfare of the Representatives in Congress is a most beautiful evidence of gratitude for past favors; but there is little hope that it will avail their coffers one single penny.

Judge Ogden's Misconception.

If Judge Ogden, of Alameda County, the other day expressed an honest opinion, he proved himself too ignorant of the ways of this mundane sphere to be either an experienced or safe Judge. He refused to believe a husband, and two witnesses, as to acts of flirtation by the wife, on the sole ground that she came of respectable parentage. The husband was not appealing to the Court for any sort of redress; but for very naturally expostulating in private with his wife, she had him there as defendant in a suit for divorce, his too loving anxiety on her account being judicially held to be "extreme cruelty." Said the Judge: "Although it did not appear in evidence, it is yet a fact that the plaintiff comes of respectable parents; in fact, her father is a clergyman. Wantons do not come from such homes." In the first place, the Court in plaintiff's interest went outside the record for evidence not to be found within it, and that evidence he appears to have permitted to control his decision. In effect he says the husband ought to have known that a clergyman's daughter would only flirt innocently. Even if that were so, he still had a right to complain of it as unseemly in the mother of his children, and that appears to have been all he did. But how did Judge Ogden gain his knowledge as to where wantons do, or do not, come from? It is almost proverbial here, as it is in older and more staid countries, that clergymen's children are the worst of children, and that, in point of fact, they are much given to "going to the bad." It would be invidious to name local instances, but Judge Ogden's acquaintances can doubtless enlighten him on the point. There is, however, a case so conspicuous that there can be no impropriety in referring to it. The beautiful but notorious Lily Langtry is the daughter of a clergyman, and was raised not only in a good home, but amidst environments that all made for propriety and virtue. Yet the world too well knows what she became. The "Jersey Lily" has been in search of a divorce from Mr. Langtry for many years, but has never yet found a court in which she dare ask for a hearing. She has had the misfortune all this while to overlook Judge Ogden, of Alameda County.

Will Not Succeed.

The London Times welcomes Senator Wolcott, praises his capacity and integrity, and says that President-elect McKinley could not have chosen a more acceptable envoy—all of which is very sweet and nice on the part of the Times, but we soon learn that its soft words are to butter no parsnips. It proceeds very delicately to regret that so distinguished a representative should have come upon so impossible a task. It says that the failure of his mission, in any other sense than as a political move to placate the silverites at home, is certain. Of course it is. We all well knew that in advance. The plank in the Republican platform was only intended for buncombe, and the roving commission given to the ablest silverite of them all, was intended, first, as a compliment to him, and, second, as an object lesson to teach his silver friends that European finance is not to be captured by merely dropping a little salt upon its tail. For good, or for ill, the single standard of value for Europe is now fixed and immutable. All trade, commerce, and values are based upon it. Silver is used for subsidiary purposes, and, of course, the cheaper the commercial nations can buy the white bullion the better for them. As we are the principal producers of that metal, it savors somewhat of simplicity to ask them to establish a corner in silver for our benefit, but to their own loss. The proposition was from the first a political device, trick, and humbug that everybody ought to have seen through. The rich silver mine owners were never deceived by it for a single instant, but many of their ignorant and deluded followers were, and in drawing them away it achieved its sole purpose. The truth is that silver must hereafter sell for what it is worth in the markets of the world. The United States Government has already passed the limits of safety in trying, without success, to uphold it. It is said that we, as a people, have not enough gold with which to transact our business. Very well. Let us, then, obtain more gold, and the way to do that, is to do as we did last year. We bought fewer goods abroad, sold more products, and, within the first ten months of the year, had a comfortable balance of trade in our favor, all in gold, he it remembered, of $266,086,709. The year upon which we have entered promises to do much better than that, because the prices obtained for our products are higher. The way for the individual to acquire gold is to earn more and spend less. Precisely the same rule applies to a nation of individuals.

The State of Legalized Brutality. The State of Nevada has long had an unenviable reputation all over the country, and so far from being abashed thereby, it is only anxious to add to it. Known in politics as "the rotten pocket borough," it is about to become notorious as the State of legalized brutality. That it should, at a time when every State in the Union had driven prize fighting clean out of the country, have repealed its own existing law, and, from motives of gain, passed another rendering prize fighting legal within its borders, is more than we had been prepared to believe of Nevada, shameless as we knew it to be. The United States guarantees a republican form of government to every State, but in the greater part of Nevada there is practically no government at all. It is a go-as-you-please arrangement all round. A man may not even live there, if a stronger one does not like him. Only a short time ago a highly respectable foreman of a mine was taken from the streets of Nevada's principal city, marched across the border, and warned never to return. His offense was that of being the employee of a new set of directors. The Governor, Sheriff, and other officials looked on approvingly rather than otherwise. It has long been believed that anybody could be "put out of the way" in Nevada for money, and that belief is only too well sustained by proof. Familiarity with these things has doubtless done much to brutalize Nevada, to render it callous to the opinion of the rest of the country, and to constitute it the Hades of the continent. All that is decent in California regrets that Nevada should be so near. Better it were in Mexico, or better still, dropped into the depths of the ocean, along with Sharkey, Long Green Lawrence, and his Arizona friend, Empire Earp. It was very noticeable that the Examiner gave the shameful measure all the aid and comfort it could. The pugs are now asking for cheap fares. They should be given free rides upwards as high as Mordecais' gate.

Regulating The Sale Of Poisons. There is a bill before the Legislature that ought to pass. It makes the sale of poisons, without a medical certificate, and without a record being kept of the same, accessible to all who may be interested, a misdemeanor. It also makes druggists responsible in pecuniary damages to husbands, wives, or other relatives who may suffer loss through the infringement of the act. This being a general law, it will be applicable to the country districts where it is very badly needed. In San Francisco we have a local ordinance which measureably fills the bill, but the proposed state law is better. In one of the bay counties a case recently turned up in which a young wife was supplied by the village Pharmacist, who was also a Doctor, with an alarming quantity of Chloral Hydrate, and when the inevitable resulted, and for days she hovered between life and death, he sought exorbitant fees for attending to the life he had for gain endangered. In the first place he had charged for the prescription, then for the drug, and finally for a very defective cure. The prescription happened to fall into the husband's hands and hence some interesting litigation. In another instance no difficulty was found in buying a corrosive poison to administer to a man in order to obtain the amount of a policy of insurance on his life. He luckily escaped, after suspecting the truth, and proving it. No doubt scores of cases, more innocent, perhaps, than these, yet of serious consequence, are daily occurring in some part of the State. The sale of opium, chloral, morphine, and kindred poisons are ruining thousands of families, and a law to prevent it must be passed, and its enforcement rendered certain, if it takes every constable in the State to accomplish that very desirable end.

Railroad Bankruptcies In 1896. It is difficult to get anybody, during these hard times, to listen to the undoubted truth that the railroad fares and freights of the country, instead of being much too high, are in most instances greatly too low. There are far larger proportionate losses in this business than in any other kind of enterprise. The number of foreclosure sales of bankrupt railroad properties during last year was 58, involving 13,730 miles of road, owing in bonds and stocks $1,150,000,000. In the preceding year, 1895, fifty-two railroads, with 12,831 miles of roadbed, and a total indebtedness of $761,000,000 became bankrupt. As if this were not enough, last year 34 additional roads with an indebtedness of $275,597,000, and owning 5,441 miles of roadbed, had to apply to the courts for protection against their creditors and go into the hands of receivers. Seventy per cent of the money invested in railroads by stockholders is earning no dividend, and nearly twenty per cent of railroad bonds have gone to default. It is computed, and can be demonstrated, that if the railroads of this country had charged the same average of fares and freights as prevailed in England, their gross earnings of last year would have been $376,000,000 greater than they were. Common carrying in the United States is the cheapest in the world. Despite its cheapness and consequent failures, the cry of the day is for reduced fares and freights—that is, for confiscation. The power of the courts alone saves railroad property to-day from total annihilation. Bryan and Altgeld are for taking away that power.

A Few of Those Who Stumbled. It is difficult to realize, until we group them, the long list of mortality in a single year among the men and women whose names are the property of the whole people. Try to recall the names of public and prominent persons, the accounts of whose deaths you have seen in the papers during the past year, and your fingers will probably suffice to tally them. Without attempting anything like an exhaustive list, let us name a few of the most prominent among those of our own country alone as examples. From among journalists, authors, and publishers, there passed away in 1896: Henry C. Bowen of the Independent, H. C. Bunner of Puck, Kate Field of Washington, J. W. Harper of the Harper publications, John A. Cockeril, Mary Abigail Dodge, Thomas W. Knox, Edgar W. Nye, and Harriet Beecher Stowe. The list of public men includes such names as Benjamin H. Bristow, Charles F. Crisp, John R. Fellows, Governor F. T. Greenhalge, and William E. Russell. The theatrical profession mourns the loss of Henry E. Ahbey, Italo Campanini, James Lewis, Frank Mayo, J. H. McVicker, and Alexander Salviui, while among millionaires and famous business men were numbered Austin Corbin, Hamilton Disston, John H. Inman, and Enoch Pratt. Here are twenty-four names familiar to the whole country. Could you have named ten of them from memory? Yet the whole list would comprise a hundred and fifty names, and, strangely enough, not a San Franciscan among them.

AT THE CAPITOL.

SACRAMENTO, February 4, 1897.

CHIEF Clerk Duckworth has been the star performer of the Legislature this week; and by his testimony charitably assumes the most of the sins of his confreres in the stuffed pay-roll crime. Assemblyman Emmons turned the search-light on the witness, who, under his questions, made admissions that would have been damaging to any less flagrant violation of integrity than is an admitted fact. While Duckworth made many of the appointments under violent pressure, he no doubt was prodigal of promises in order to ensure his own election. From the present indications, I believe that the investigation will will end in a reprimand. But a scorching minority report may be expected, fathered by Emmons, who, by the way, is an honest and intelligent legislator.

The attempt to take a half-million from the Treasury, and divide it between retaining dams for the miners and a State dredger for reclamation of overflowed lauds, called Speaker Coombs from the chair to denounce the measure and inform the legislators that a record-making crisis confronted them. A combination has been effected between the localities and constituencies most interested, and the measure passed the House with a whoop, despite the earnest and angry protests of a very decided minority. Its fate in the Senate is more a matter of doubt, and the taxpayers may be saved in the Upper House and on the Governor's desk.

Los Angeles street contractors are here, interested in a bill which, if it should pass, would work a great hardship on the owners of property contiguous to the streets on which the improvements have been made. At present payment for street work may be made by bond running ten years. The new "cinch" bill permits foreclosure and transfer of title to the property securing the bonds, unless paid upon one year's notice. Some of the contractors interested in this bill hold as high as a quarter million in these improvement bonds.

At pretty nearly every session of the Legislature, tribute has been levied among other corporations and firms, on the foreign marine insurance companies by means of "cinch" bills. Without ascribing any improper motive to Senator Bert, who is the father of Senate Bill No. 11, the measure, I feel, would be an unjust and unnecessary law if passed, and the fact remains that this bill is one of the biennial "cinch" bills, and should be beaten. Its object is to prevent any foreign insurance company from doing business in this State unless there is on deposit in some State in the United States securities to the amount of $200,000. Inasmuch as marine insurance companies are the particular insurance companies the bill aims at, and as there is really no good reason why they should be asked to have securities on deposit as is proposed, there is, on the other hand, several reasons why the law is ill-advised and unnecessary. Insurance Commissioner Higgins incorporates in his late report to the Governor some of the arguments used by those who favor the measure. Some statements are wholly incorrect, while others are misleading. In one place he says "the companies foreign to the United States do not pay taxes," and that only a fee of $20 for filing their annual statement is received from them. As a matter of fact, not only the $20 fee, but taxes in several forms are paid by such companies. Every quarter taxes on the amount of premiums recorded is collected. When over $10,000, the tax is $50; when under that amount, $25. Then there is an annual tax on the money in bank of each company, and a franchise tax on an estimated valuation of the company's franchise, which is never set at less than $2,000. Besides, these companies employ clerks, pay office rent and add in other ways to the prosperity of the State. If the people were to be benefited, of course no objection could be made to the bill, but it seems to me that by destroying competition certain companies could holdly raise their rates to suit themselves, much to the disadvantage of those the law pretends to benefit. Another argument of the Insurance Commissioner, so far as marine companies are concerned, which falls to the ground, is that a law requiring deposits would prevent forced settlements with the insured, insinuating that such a procedure was a common one. As a matter of fact, so I am informed by reliable marine insurance men, there is yet to be recorded a case where a foreign marine company evaded payment of a loss or forced in compromise by threatened expensive litigation in a foreign country. The deposit feature, however, would not be utterly objectionable if a reasonable amount were specified, say $50,000. Even that is really too large, but a $200,000 deposit would drive pretty nearly every foreign marine company out of business in California.

The new Board of State Library Trustees, so it is reported, will elect W. W. Seaman, of Los Angeles, to succeed Dr. Matthews, who is the present State Librarian and Mixologist, with private bar in Librarian's office.

'We obey no wand but pleasure's.'—Tom Moore.

I THINK that somewhere "in the dark backward and abysm of time," (as Mr. Bierce so fondly and so frequently quotes) a coarse ancestor of mine must have stormed and hellowed from his seat in the pit his robust rapture for the large uncompromising play acting of Mrs. Siddons. Something in me wakes and stirs to Macbeth. I have long and urgently deplored what I have called by no less title, if you please, than The Art of Obvious Playacting. I never quite wanted to reduce life or drama to the pianissimo of Mr. Howells's, who writes with a chaperon, but I cherished a superior disdain of plays and players of the stage stagey. Now I find it possible to take my meed of tragedy in the proper Siddons spirit. At least Macbeth rouses me thoroughly, takes me by the blood and vertebrae and shakes me into strauge excitement.

Macbeth, with all its symbols and psychology is first, last and all the time drama of action and incident and valorous and bloodthirsty phrases—in a word, melodrama. History does not chronicle the actor who has played a quiet Macbeth; even ultra-modernity does not ask for one; and the pink dawn of Romance, with its attendant sword, daggers and feats of arms and feats of lungs may even bring about a renaissance of the long lost "heavy legitimate." And the heavy legitimate demands heavy play-acting to-day, just as it did in the palmy and pre-palmy days of old. Only there must be one innovation: Shakespeare must be well dressed. The days of the shabby-genteel legitimate are over. Henry Irving, Augustin Daly and Richard Wagner—yes, Wagner and Beyreuth and the Metropolitan Opera House—have spoiled the public for masterpieces in rags. The sleek, prosperous present will accept contemporary romance in hand-me-downs, but it wants all velvet, and a yard wide, for the masterpieces. This is the reason why Irving and Daly are the only managers who can gracefully pull through a New York season with the "classics." This is why Margaret Mather's Cymbeline has to be advertised as a "$25,000 production;" and the absence of it is why Louis James is hooked, "the only tragedian on the road this season"—for even the provinces have become fastidious. It is of course true that the legitimate died, not for want of good clothes and brilliant lights and millionaire scenery, but for want of playactors, real playactors, not enemy imitation play actors. But the age is luxurious; virtuosity is out of vogue. It takes more than one star to make a first night, and two's not a company. And so I take it that in the face of fads and cheap plays and cheap acting San Francisco has done handsomely by Modjeska and Haworth, and the slap-gathered little hand of players who support them.

Speaking of playacting, it is well for us to realize that in all America the brightest representative of this almost lost art is Joseph Haworth. And this simple statement of truth is not half the compliment Haworth merits, because practically he has no competitors. Mansfield is a freak, young Salvini is dead, Warde is worse than dead, and James, though an actor of conspicuous talent, lacks the vital element of distinction. So Haworth is more than the peer of these. In fact, it looks very much as though he and Nat Goodwin were to divide the more dignified responsibility of the American stage for the next decade.

Haworth's Macbeth, being a creature of broad vocal depths and clean, impressive reading and irreproachably developed crescendo, is not a new Macbeth, beyond the rich color quality Haworth gives him out of his own personality. As I said before, a new Macbeth would have to be a soft one, and Shakespeare has left enough soft spots in him as it is without requiring the misreading of any sensation-seeking actor. Considering William Shakespeare's occasional tendency to smother meaning in sweet phrases for the music-loving ear, and the length of Macbeth's part, it is conspicuously well defined. Of course, no sane person, removed from the evil prejudices of the schoolroom, can follow Macbeth through the splendid blend of despair and fury voiced in

I will not yield

And to be baited with the rabble's curse!
Though Birnam wood be come to Dunsinane,
And thou opposed, being of no woman born,
Yet will I try the last—and then see him started to the fray on this puny, Mother Goose couplet,

Lay on, Macduff;
And damned be he who first cries "Hold; enough!"

without wishing William had enjoyed the privilege of such an editor, say, as Miss Gilder of The Critic. One might as well split gloves over the rhetorical juiciness of when some horny-lunged Thespian exalts it to the pivot of a scene.

A horse! A horse! My kingdom for a horse!

However it is not my aim to be classed among those ambiguous gentlemen, Shakespearian scholars. I do not want to hicker about the temperature of the green calcium in the dagger scene, or how many little whiskers the first witch should wear on her chin. When you go after the Bard with a search light and a grappling iron and a Boccaccio and a Holinshed, you lose sight of his transcendent scheme—he wrote for the playhouse and endeavored to be entertaining. Haworth seems to take very much the same view. He does not strive for any deep mysticism that is not on the surface of the text. He concedes Macbeth a covetous rascal in his first attack of the witches; he gives him a broad brutality of his own, which, contrasted with the fragility of Modjeska's Lady Macbeth, keeps him rather prominently aloof from the hen-pecked key. This is the only charge of radicalism that can be laid against him. His development of the character is unswerving and masterful; the ambition, the touch of humanness, the fear, the fatalism, the deed which is gilded with ambition, then crime gilded by more crime and attended by their vengeance of superstition and hallucination; the man submerged, the brute upheld until, in the climax of the combat with Macduff, he fights and dies with the snarl and—so almost is the illusion—the very being of an animal. And this is play acting? obvious, too? May I never again grow too young to enjoy it.

Modjeska plays Lady Macbeth very much as Patti might sing Brünhilde. And in a cast made up of vociferous traditionalists—who made a Scottish holiday of the rare opportunity to tear passion to tatters and still not exceed the bounds of art—her repressed intensity, and candid femininity could not be otherwise than at a disadvantage. Modjeska's reading is beautifully lucid and sincere, and in the sleep-walking scene she is stirringly convincing, but Nature never builded for an actress to embody such a Mary Stuart as Modjeska's, and yet attain to the heroic severity of Lady Macbeth.

The disaster which befell Mr. Lonergan, and cast something of a gloom over the Macbeth-Macduff fight in the last act, is not without the solace of humor: Mr. Lonergan's voice forsook him, and he was compelled to fight in a hoarse whisper. Prior to this misadventure, Mr. Lonergan's work was earnest and telling. Mr. Osbourne played the drunken porter with such rare unctuousness (unctuousness is a word much abused by dramatic critics: it really serves at its best when describing the utter greasiness of a classic jag) as to almost redeem that ill-timed hit of "comic relief" with which William Shakespeare destroyed the suspense of one of the best moments in his play. The excellence of Landers Stevens's performance dumbfounded me. There were address, and resolution, and manly music, and a picture in his Malcolm.

Mary Stuart and Modjeska are names inseparably cherished in the hearts of this generation of play-goers. There is no other actress who can give to this old-fashioned picture play the fragrance, the spirituality, the complete reality that Modjeska does. In it she finds the epitome of her temperament. And it seemed more than a coincidence on Saturday night, when Modjeska played this part, as we of San Francisco have never seen even her play it he-fore, that Haworth should have given us a Mortimer equally unforgettable. And think what there is to Mortimer's part—one bit, the death scene. Yet the eloquence, the heart-touch, the magnetic thrill of that moment, were as near the perfection of human art as we ever like to find it. It was not a night for sympathy with ill-advised Mrs. Edgerton, who took this occasion to forsake the respectable business of a drawing-room reciter for the fiercer glitter of real footlights. Mrs. Edgerton has a bumptious conception of Queen Elizabeth which is certainly novel, but far from plausible. I think she mistakes the bastard queen for a female Falstaff.

The Tivoli has always been neglected in the matter of fair criticism, the policy of the papers being something like this: "If it is a good show, puff it; if it is not so good, puff it anyway—there is always the money's worth at the Tivoli." Waiving all loftier considerations, this has been somewhat unjust to the management, inasmuch as the critics have not always considered it necessary to visit the Tivoli prior to the puff. I have often claimed that the only unprejudiced theatrical reviews were those written by persons who never have seen the performance under discussion or formed any opinions whatever on the relative excellence of amusements—because your true critic being by instinct and cultivation a man of taste, and hence acquiring a delicate appetite for what is good and artistic, and a vigorous distaste for what is neither of these, is, of course, unfitted for impartial consideration of the average performance in the average playhouse. In extenuation of myself, Aladdin, at the Tivoli, is not an average performance, not merely a good show for a cheap price. It is a smashing spectacular production and ten times better in every particular than either Jack and the Beanstalk or Babes in the Wood. It has that which both of those pieces lacked—a certain measure of unity. In Aladdin there are fun, color, glitter, pageantry, ballet, songs, specialty and specialty, all in the happiest balance. Ferris Hartman does not have the entire performance on his shoulders, and consequently both Mr. Hartman and the performance appear to much better advantage. In fact I have never seen Hartman so genuinely comical as he is this week. There is also a satisfying surety in all the electrical and mechanical devices, and the flower dance on the darkened stage danced by five girls studded with twinkling incandescents, is an Edisonian dream. The six little tailors headed by little Jack Robertson (a clever little lad in every particular except that of singing through his little nose) are already the talk of all the children and grandparents in town. Miss Seabrook seems of a sudden to have lost her aggressive Della Foxisms and her Aladdin is proportionately that much better than it would have been two weeks ago. All the Tivoli people are in the production, not forgetting those wonderful chorus girls to whom the Tivoli is largely indebted for every success. All in all, Aladdin to my mind is the best extravaganza ever staged at the Tivoli.

They call it The Prodigal Father at the Columbia, but it isn't. Father has not come home yet; he's still out prodigally, and several first-class vaudeville people, and several who are not so first-class are keeping the stage warm for him. If you really must have the comedy, The Prodigal Father, it is in a footnote on the programme. I did not need it myself; there were too many good variety acts bouncing about the stage. May Irwin's new song—the successor to "The New Bully"—"Oh, Mr. Johnson!"—is sung in the first act. It is the most fraternal thing I've heard in years—you can't lose it. Titenia's titivating toes, Rose Melville's "jay girl from Slab Hollow," and "Oh, Mr. Johnson!" are to the limit of spiciness. And spiciness is the life of variety.

After the little Titian tenor, Guille, had opened wide his silver throat, and sung the rafters out of the Orpheum, and sung them back again, and the audience still clamored for more, something happened which caused Phil Hastings to swoon outright in his great-coat. Guille bounded down to the lights, handed Rosner a piano score, and commenced to sing "I dread the day you'll forget me, Marguerite." I waited, breathless, my eyes riveted on the gallery. Guille ended with a skyward flourish, smiled at the audience a smile which said, "You bet zere aire no thees zon me, I'm—what you call—up to ze minute." And in the gallery not even a gun was fired, for the gallery smiled, too. This was last Sunday night.

The new season of symphony concerts opened rather unpropitiously Thursday afternoon at the Columbia. It rained menageries without, and a defective furnace smoked hard enough to have cured hams within. Mr. Hinrichs and his musicians claim neither the valor nor the lungs of accomplished firemen, so to have played as well as they did while choking with smoke and smell (Mr. Greenbaum did not have time to perfume the fire) is doubly to their credit. Dvorak's D major symphony and Tschaiakowsky's "Marche Slave" were the novelties. The symphony is wantonly melodious, and the orchestration burns and zips in the Bohemian composer's characteristic spirit. American music has a very nice step-papa in Dr. Dvorak. The March teems with rhythm and color, and the interblending of the Russian hymn is handled with fine craft; in fact, the entire work is one of strong character and masterly instrumentation. Mrs. Hinrichs' singing of the air from The Queen of Sheba was disappointing. Her contralto is tremulous and not always true, and her method of singing is labored and unmusicianly.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Chimmie Fadden, with the original company, comes to the Columbia next Monday for two weeks, with Charles Hopper in the title-role. The company is strong, and the dramatization of the play is said to be of even greater interest than the original story.

Louis James, a sterling actor, opens a two weeks' season at the Baldwin Monday night, in a revival of Dr. Bird's heroic play, Spartacus. Old theatre-goers will remember Forrest and McCullough in the gladiatorial role, which now is said to fit Mr. James better than anything he has ever played before. Alna Kruger and Guy Lindsley are of the company.

Next week at the Orpheum Guille will sing Gounod's "Ave Maria," with violin obligato by Miss Nina de St. Herbert, a young San Franciscienne. Ara, Zebra and Vora, European equilibrists, and John and Bertha Gleason, dancers, are the other new features.

Mlle. Trebelli, prima donna soprano, (a daughter of the famous contralto by that name), assisted by Hinrichs' Symphony Orchestra, will give a concert at the California on Tuesday night, which promises to be one of the biggest musical events of the season. Trebelli will sing, among other numbers, the cavatina from Semiramide, the Salomé air from Massenet's Herodiade, and Solberg's Song, which Grieg composed for Ibsen's Peer Gynt. Schubert, Humperdink, Saint-Saëns, and Delibes will be represented in the orchestral selections.

Aladdin has made a big hit at the Tivoli, and will continue indefinitely.

CHIEF Dennis Sullivan of the Fire Department is a practical joker past reformation, and his best efforts in the indulgence of this pastime are reserved for his most intimate friends. His great crony is Johnny Murphy, proprietor of the St. George Stables, and not long ago the pair went on a little trip into the country. The chief started homewards in the evening, but Murphy, who had met some convivial spirits remained behind, lingered long over a bowl of wassail and concluded to retain his comfortable quarters for the night. Before his departure, Sullivan told the landlord of the village inn that his friend, Johnny Murphy, suffered from occasional catalepsy and had to be waked up every hour.

"He may kick a little when you rouse him," said Sullivan, "but don't you pay any attention to that. You wake him up every sixty minutes, sure now, or he will die."

Much impressed by this warning, the landlord followed the Chief's instructions to the letter. In vain Murphy roared in indignation, groaned about his head and begged to be allowed to sleep in peace. To be sure that he was awake, the landlord, aided by the barkeeper and the Chinese cook, made him get out of bed and run around the room after each hourly "treatment." The Murphy rage was impotent and he was forced to submit.

When Johnny came home he did not say much but he waited patiently for a chance to even up his score. He planned a blow at the Chief's dignity the other day by delivering a bogus message.

"Eddie Graney left word for you here," said Murphy, "that he wanted you to superintend the whitewashing of his place."

Parenthetically it may be observed that when Graney is not "doing politics," he conducts a large blacksmith shop in St. George's Alley, in convenient proximity to Murphy's stable and the Fire Engine headquarters.

The Chief was secretly affronted by the message which he believed was genuine and supposed was intended by Graney to depreciate his importance in the eyes of the members of the Fire Department.

"All right, I'll boss his job" quickly responded Sullivan no little acrimony mingled with his alacrity, while Johnny Murphy satisfied with the movement, of the wheels he had set in motion, turned away in gladness.

When Graney returned to his establishment late that afternoon he was filled with consuming wrath. The whitewashing had not been confined to the interior of the shop, but the entire front of the place had been covered with the cheap mixture, obliterating the expensive paint placed there a few weeks earlier. Worst of all his immense horse shoe of wrought iron, Graney's especial pride, had been given two coats of whitewash.

"What bally idiot did this?" shouted Grauey in a fine frenzy. He used much additional language that was really superfluous and unnecessary to this narrative.

"A chap they call 'Chief' hossed the job," said one of the white washers. "He directed it all. And say, Graney, as there was so much extra work done, the job will cost you five dollars more than the price I told you."

And then Grauey's language was positively shocking.

Some little amusement has been caused by Fremont Older's expedition to Canton, undertaken "because the Major sent for him." Behind the visit to the President-elect in behalf of Judge Waymire's Cabinet aspirations is a little story of how Older fooled his dearest friends regarding his movements. At the time of the Senatorial election, the editor went to Sacramento as the adviser of the Alameda Assemblyman, whom he suddenly precipitated into the "fight" against Perkins, in consequence of which faux pas Waymire failed to secure endorsement for the Cabinet by the Republican legislative caucus. After it was all over, Older came home and went to bed with nervous prostration. He was invisible to his most intimate friends, and did not even hold communication with the editorial rooms of his paper. As days went by and Older failed to reappear, his associates grew anxious, but all inquiries regarding Fremont's health were answered with the indefinite gravity of a serious illness. After two weeks, Older's office companions became genuinely alarmed over his condition, and the gravest results of nervous prostration were suggested. Just when apprehension was at its height, a dispatch from Chicago was printed in a morning paper to the effect that Older was en route to Canton to plead Waymire's cause. Then the nature of his mysterious malady was apparent. It is said that if Waymire should be appointed to the Cabinet, Older would be the Chief Clerk of his department—a contingency which will hardly cause him to leave his present position. The President-elect is said to have suggested to Older that "perhaps Judge Waymire is needed in the California Legislature," so the Alameda statesman may never be transferred to the whirl of Washington political life.

No doubt many people are haunted by the fear that they may be buried alive, and this mortal terror is kept active by periodical stories of uncovered graves and the discovery of the terrible truth that those who had been placed in them had awakened only to find themselves four feet under ground and no telephone handy. A striking illustration of this fear occurred recently in this city. A wealthy man, feeling the approach of the grisly monster, and fearing that it might only be a bluff, determined not to be caught napping. He gave rigid instructions that the utmost precautions should be employed to determine if he had really departed to the pale realm of shade before his body should be committed to mother earth. He ordered that his executor, under pain of his immediate displeasure, should stay his body for three days in a vault, and surround it by perpetual watchers, who should note the least appearance of returning life. After this prolonged vigil, a physician should appear, and with the tools of his trade, gently but firmly disturb the repose of the remains by a scientific examination to the very seat of existence—the heart. If the result disclosed the final fact of death, the obsequies might proceed. He wanted to take no chances. Death finally came, and after the usual ceremonies the remains were transferred to a vault and the watch set about the body for three days. Evidently life had fled; further assurance of that fact was not needed. But the executor determined to meet the orders of the deceased, and called Dr. H. Isaac Jones to make the final test. The doctor made the examination as required, although he knew it to be useless, and was told thereafter that embalming fluid had been freely used before the body was placed in the vault. Inasmuch as the smallest quantity of this preserver of the dead would prove immediately fatal to a healthy bullock, the dissecting knife was really superfluous. The LOOKER ON did not think to ask whether the injection had been made at the previous instance of the deceased, as additional security against his premature interment; but he is prepared to believe it was.

There is no doubt, however, that deceased was dead.

Some time ago, Grace Church organized, under the direction of W. H. Holt, an able organist from England, an adult male choir. Although the change was undertaken as an experiment, it has been most successful from its inception, the church evening praise services having been largely attended. On Sunday evening, the nineteenth festival service will be held, and an especially prepared programme, which here follows, will be given:

- Motet—88th Psalm, (Ernest Ford)..... Full Choir
- Tenor Solo—"Babylon," (Watson)..... Frank Coffin
- Anthem—"The Radiant Morn," (Woodward)..... Full Choir
- Barytone Solo—"Israfil," (Oliver King)..... S. Homer Henley
- Tenor Solo and Chorus—"From out the Radiant Morn," Frank Coffin and Choir.

Offertory—Organ Solo "Allegretto," (Wely).

The following gentlemen constitute the choir: Tenors, Frank Coffin, J. M. Shawhan, P. L. Rowe, J. E. Jones, G. H. J. Bremner, Charles Henning; Basses, S. Homer Henley, W. McDonald, George Bateh, George H. Hoyer, N. B. Frisbie, S. E. Tucker, C. E. Holt.

Down in the Board Room of the Stock Exchange they are having no little diversion over the mutual jublations of W. E. Miles and J. M. Forbes, each broker being satisfied that he "did the other up," while the other members agree that honors are about even. Forbes is a big man, and for years he has patiently cultivated a beard, until it matched his other gigantic proportions. Those flowing whiskers were the chief joy and pride of his life. He lavished his affection on the capillary appendage to his chin, which made him look like a Populist of the middle-of-the-road breed. The other stock-brokers chaffed Forbes unmercifully about his whiskers, but Forbes loyally stuck to them.

One day this week, Miles offered for sale three hundred shares of Yellow Jacket stock.

"I will give you thirty-four for the lot," said Forbes.

"You can have it for thirty-one, if you will go downstairs to the barbershop and shave those whiskers," replied Miles, tauntingly.

To his surprise and grief, Forbes promptly took him up. In twenty minutes the beard lived only in history. It was a thing of the past. Forbes then claimed the Yellow Jacket stock at three points lower than his own bid, and Miles reluctantly relinquished it. It was now Forbes' turn to buy Miles; but the tables were again turned, for on the following day Yellow Jacket was quoted at twenty-nine, and Forbes admitted, with chagrin, that he had paid two points higher than the current quotation of the stock. Miles thinks the laugh is all his way now, for he bought back all the stock he wanted at twenty-nine. But Forbes mourns his lost whiskers and refuses to be comforted, because they are not.

Mr. Harrison, the Sausalito Coal King, is once more on 'Change. He went to Washington six weeks ago to interview Mr. McKinley agent the opening of the Coast road through the Government reservation to Point Lobos. "William," said Mr. McKinley, as reported by Mr. Harrison, "you may have my bead for a football if that road don't go through. I know how Billy Berg, the German traveller, Tom Watson, Frank Cartan, and all the boys want that road, and they are going to have it. Give my regards to Commodore Harrison, and tell him we keep informed here about the way he is running those water works, and that if he does not come down a bit, I will have to send a special commission to Marin County to regulate affairs."

Mr. Harrison thus merrily discourses of the great men he has met on his travels. The California newspaper boys Willie took with him are homesick. Arthur McEwen says he would rather be bammering away at the orthodox creeds in this glorious climate on a cracker a week, than living in New York on terrapin and champagne; Bob Davis has run out of his Western lies, and Charley Michelson cries himself to sleep every night from pure nostalgia.

While the rain was coming down in torrents, and the wind blowing a gale which made the anemometer whirl at the rate of fifty miles an hour, a portly Montgomery street real estate agent stood in the doorway of his office talking to a friend possessing fewer years and less avoirdupois and discretion.

"Just look at that woman crossing the street," said the younger man. "Beef to the heels, like a Mullingar beifer! Great Scott! White stockings, too! Doesn't she look like a tad? Wouldn't that jar you?"

"It undoubtedly would jar me, but for one fact," said the real estate man, sweetly. "You see," he added, "she's my wife."

Donald deV. Graham took a large quantity of sketching material with him to the Islands. That is the place for models. Mr. Graham can catch the "altogether" in the water, where they disport like mermaids, or on the banks of the Nuuanu river, where they pose like Diana, fresh from her bath. They are by no means immodest, because too familiar with nudity to perceive anything objectionable in it, and they only entertain a dim idea of what virtue which their white sisters speak about actually means. They are daughters of Nature, those Hawaiian damsels, and obey all her promptings without any self-consciousness of evil.

Harry Lynch, Superintendent of Construction for the Market Street Railway Company, has returned from the East, crammed with information on motors. Mr. Lynch declares that the days of the horse as a carrier are numbered in New York. He attended a meeting at which the street space occupied by delivery wagons was discussed. There are about 6,000 wagons of this nature in New York, and these horses, with stables, etc., occupy a most a quarter of the street space, of that city. Therefore, the municipality has decided that the horse must go and the wagons be propelled by compressed air. Mr. Lynch rode on a coach driven by compressed air, which had a speed capacity of thirty-five miles an hour, and its arrangement so simple that a child might be entrusted with the lever. We shall see some of them on this side pretty shortly.

The epicures of the clubs declare that the genuine New York sheep head has found its way to our waters, and is in the market to-day. Major Ned Palmer and Warren Payne, members of the Pots and Pans Society, have made affidavit that they ate a genuine sheep head on Friday, and that it was sweet as butter. Captain House, by the invention of his soluble Welch rarebit, has caused a run on the chafing dish stores, and never before was the gum tickling little animal so popular. Some of the haughty swells of the clubs mix it with champagne, and declare that the foaming wine and the rarebit were made for one another, while the more conservative old boys stick to ale and porter. The House rarebit requires neither, and may be eaten cold, which is a revelation in this line of natural history.

A short time ago we noticed in this column a volume of criticisms by an English critic—Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch; we now wish to draw attention to a hook by an American critic—Professor Brander Mathews, of Columbia College, New York. "Ventures in Criticism" consists of seven essays, the most interesting of which are those entitled "American Literature," "On pleasing the taste of the public," "Mr. Andrew Lang" and "Robert Louis Stevenson." Of the English language the Professor says: "It is a heritage which we derived from our forefathers. We hold it by right of hirth. . . It is an American possession, as it is a British possession, no more and no less; and we hold it on the same terms that our cousins do. We have the rights of ownership, and the responsibilities also, exactly as they have, and to exactly the same extent." Now this is, of course, true; but it is not the whole truth. Though English is the mother-tongue of Britou and American alike, they do not stand in quite the same relations to it. Whenever any question as to what is or is not English arises, we must refer to the British usage, and not to the American. As the late Richard Grant White so clearly pointed out, in so far as English-speaking people, whether Australians, New Zealanders, or natives of North America speak a language differing from that spoken by the best speakers of Great Britain, they are not speaking English; at any rate, not the English of to-day. We have an almost perfect analogy to this in the languages of ancient Greece: while the Greek colonists spread all along the European, African and Asiatic coasts of the Mediterranean, carrying their mother-tongue with them, deriving it from their forefathers, holding it by right of hirth, and all the rest of it, yet Greek as spoken by the inhabitants of one single city of Greece always remained the highest form of the language. Classical scholars do not try to write the Greek of the Rhodians, the Mityleneans, or the Greek colonists of Egypt, but the Greek of Demosthenes, Plato, Aeschylus and Euripides: while they read and admire the poems of Hesiod and Homer, and the histories of Herodotus, they carefully abstain from imitating the peculiarities of the Greek in which they are written. The Greek of the New Testament is simply, to a scholar, impossibly and unspeakably bad. Prose written in it would not get a man a third class at Oxford or Cambridge. We are inclined to suppose that no educated American would defer to Canadian or Australian usage, yet it is just as authoritative, "no more and no less," as the English spoken in the United States: that is to say, it is the language of a colony, and not of a mother-land. No educated Hollander cares a straw for the usages of Dutch colouists in Java or Sumatra, and no educated Frenchman regards the French of Martinique or Réuion. Nor would they regard them any more though each of those countries contained seventy millions of people. In speaking of Mr. Andrew Lang the Professor says that "though he dwells by the banks of the Thames, his pages are disfigured by no Briticisms." We must point out to the Professor, that, while there are provincialisms in the language of uneducated British people, there are no such things as "Briticisms." If the people of highest education in Great Britain use certain phrases and forms of speech, those phrases and forms are, ipso facto, good English. If we want to know whether a phrase or word is good French or not, we ask a highly educated Freuchman; if we wish to know whether a phrase or word is good Spanish or not, we refer to an educated Spaniard, not to a Mexican, a Central or South American, though those regions are many times larger than Old Spain, and contain many more millions of people. Similarly, highly educated Britons are the sole authorities on questions of English usage. Would any honest person recommend an Italian or German gentleman desirous of learning the best English to take up his residence in Australia, Canada, or the United States? We trow not. "Aspects of fiction" comprises six essays, all of which, if not particularly profound, are at any rate bright and readable. In the essay entitled "The gift of story-telling" Professor Mathews says that all writers, and indeed all artists, may be divided into three classes: "those with the special temperament, those with general ability, and the scanty few who have both the general ability and the special temperament." Thus a man may possess the story-telling gift in a high degree, and yet may be, as Charles Dickens was, a man of very moderate intelligence and little insight. Such a man will always get readers, but when he attempts to write criticisms of hooks or pictures, or to propound political or philosophical ideas, he will exhibit the real poverty of his mind and the limitations of his culture. Thus it is that we find hundreds of people of slight attainments and moderate intelligence who can tell a good story, but very few competent essayists. A perusal of Professor Mathews' volume shows that he has little Latin, and less Greek, as he himself confesses, and no intimate knowledge of any literatures except English and French. His inferiority to Grant Allen (who, though a naturalist and a novelist, is an excellent classical scholar), to A. T. Quiller-Couch, George Saintsbury, Frederick Harrison, Andrew Lang, and other British critics, is thus apparent. Indeed, no man dare set up as a literary critic in Great Britain who was not as familiar with Greek and Latin literature as with that of his own country, and reasonably at home in French and German literature as well. Thus we feel, in reading Professor Mathews' criticisms, that, while he has natural intelligence, he carries, as compared with his rivals across the Atlantic, a light armament.

* Aspects of Fiction, and other Ventures in Criticism. By Brander Mathews, New York. Harper and Brothers. 1895.

The Sierra Club Bulletin, being number 14 of the publications of the Sierra Club, has recently been issued. It consists of sixty well-printed pages, with ten full-page photogravures of mountain scenes. "On Mount Lefroy" by Charles Sproull Thompson gives an account of the untimely death of Philip Stanley Abbot, which took place on the Canadian mountain on August 3rd of last year. Mr. Bolton Coit Brown narrates the wanderings of himself and his wife in the High Sierra between Mount King and Mount Williamson. Though they reached an altitude of 14,448 feet above sea level, "Lucy" stood the fatigue and exposure wonderfully well. Howard Longley gives some advice to tyros in mountaineering as to what to take with them, and how to take it; J. M. Stillman contributes an article on the Tehipite Valley, and Theodore L. Solomons, the Overland Mouthly's "Author-explorer," one on an early summer excursion to the Tuolumne canon and Mount Lyell." The photogravure of Tehipite Dome, from a negative by Walter A. Starr, is a very satisfactory picture, as also is that of the Upper Tuolumne Canon by T. S. Solomons. Mr. John Muir, the discoverer and eponymous hero of the Muir Glacier in Alaska, is President of the Sierra Club, which also numbers Professors Joseph Le Conte and George Davidson among its Directors. Any of the publications of the club may be had, at moderate prices, on application to the Secretary, Mr. Elliott McAllister, at the Academy of Sciences Building.

"The Show Lion, and Other Dramatic Poems, Readings, and Sketches," by Cora E. Chase, is for sale at the book-stores of Messrs. Whittaker & Ray and Doxey. The title piece is a little poem of twenty-four four-lined verses, recounting how the old wild spirit and lust for blood breaks out suddenly in a captive Indian lion, so that he attacks and kills his keeper, and receives a mortal hurt himself. It is a lively, brisk, vigorous composition, and the versification is good. The rimes are unforced and correct, and the lines run easily and gracefully. The little hook contains twenty other pieces of prose or verse, of which we like best "The Nun's Rose." "The Bull-Fight," though not quite accurate as a description of the sport, is still bright and possessed of life and movement. The typography is, unfortunately, decidedly inaccurate. But this can be corrected in a later edition. For the present, the errors do not materially detract from the value of the hook as a collection of suitable hits for recitation, for which purpose it may be heartily commended. Miss Chase is a true Californian singer; her verse is healthy and will most assuredly bring fame to her in due time.

A recent issue of The Sketch (London) contains the following remarks about Dr. Robertson Nicoll's articles on his trip to the United States: "These articles show how possible it is, even for the most clear-headed and discerning of men to come back from a short trip in a great country like America with not a few false impressions. Dr. Nicoll, for example, I gather" (says the writer), "is under the very generous impression that America boasts a singularly pure Press—a Press uncontaminated to a greater extent than our own. Yet by this very mail I receive a copy of an American journal called The Wave, which emphasizes very strongly the current of impurity which runs through so much of American journalism. English journals at times, it must be admitted, may err on the side of too copious reports of disagreeable scandals or of nauseating matter from the police courts; but no English journal goes out of its way to nose out impurities and improprieties in the manner of some of the Sunday issues in America. I could show Dr. Nicoll articles and letter-press by the bushel in the American Sunday papers which come to me which would not be admitted for a single moment in the most liberal-minded English house." Somebody must have been sending the Sunday Examiner to this Londoner: we sincerely hope that in future he will keep it at home to light fires with.

The ninth annual edition of "Our Society Blue Book," published by Charles C. Hoag, is just out, and excels in attractive appearance and completeness of detail any preceding volume. Several new features are observed in the make-up and style of the publication, which add much to the artistic appearance of this work, which has become a recognized and valued authority on all matters of which it treats. It is for sale by Hartwell, Mitchell & Willis, 225 Post street and 107 Montgomery street.

The latest monthly periodical to arrive at our table is The Month, issued by The Critic Company, New York. Persons desiring to keep abreast of current literature and authors, cannot afford to overlook this highly entertaining magazine, which is issued at 10 cents a copy, or $1 per annum.

MR. A. H. Loughborough, a prominent and successful attorney of this city, and for many years a resident of San Francisco, died of apoplexy at his home on O'Farrel street early last Saturday morning. Death came most unexpectedly, as he had retired on the previous evening in usual health. Mr. Loughborough enjoyed a large practice in land and probate business, and was attorney for several financial institutions. He was a man of solid worth, and counted among his friends many people of wealth and influence. A widow and four children survive him.

A. W. FOSTER, who has for many years been President of the San Francisco & North Pacific Railroad, has been elected General Manager as well. The admirable management of this property is largely due to Mr. Foster's energy and capacity, and the increased duties will doubtless meet with the same executive ability that has characterized his entire connection with the road.

Brown's Bronchial Troches have been on the market for more than fifty years, and they are recognized as an unfailing relief for hoarseness and sore throat. They are of great value to public speakers and singers, and are of use to all persons who may be troubled with weakness of vocal chords, as they strengthen and clear the voice by their soothing and healing effect.

It is possible to get a fairly good education on things in Japanese art, by just looking in on Geo. T. Marsh at 625 Market street, under the Palace Hotel. All the quaint works, curios, rare tapestries, etc., of the quaint Japanese people seem to be collected in his store, and Marsh is always glad to show them to you. Cost? They are cheaper than ever.

It seems a rather late date to take up the report of Mr. J. W. Warburton, the British Consul-General in this city, issued by the Foreign Office in September last, as it has already been done to death in the way of criticism, favorable and otherwise, months ago. But any allusion to his scorching condemnation of the land frauds perpetrated from time to time in this State is apt to prove beneficial. Mr. Warburton is evidently the right man in the right place, while no fairer or more competent critic could be found here than Surveyor-General Green. Mr. Green confirms every charge that the Warburton report says in the spirit of honesty which has always marked his career. He goes further, and saddles the blame in the majority of instances on the foreign promoter, who frequently is himself a Briton striving for a fortune by robbing his countrymen. Mr. Green is right there, again. The rascality in promotion of mines and lands in California has never developed here. Citizens of this State have been invariably the tools of thieving adventurers, who have involved them in such a manner at times where escape has been impossible. At the earliest opportunity the NEWS LETTER will publish a complete list of British investments in mines since the earliest days of American occupation, showing the successes and failures (unfortunately in the majority) with those responsible for the promotion of the schemes. In the meantime, it is a pleasure to know that at last an official has been found in the person of Consul-General Warburton, who is not to be swayed by unfriendly criticism from his duty in protecting the interests of his fellow-countrymen against the predatory raids of their unscrupulous brethren. He may possibly be annoyed from time to time by threats to report him at the Foreign Office, in the same bombastic style of the individual who is always for "instructing his solicitor" to demand relief, or addressing the editor of the Times, with the idea that he has only to how-wow and shake the earth. It will not be a difficult matter for the Consul-General to offset any complaints of the kind should he deem them worthy of notice.

Progress of the Boom. The Alaska mining sale cropped up again during the week, the last time on a "high authority," which incontinently knocked the stuffing out of the price, which was quoted at $255,000. This is a little over half of the previous announcement, now a fortnight old, which in turn was $150,000 above the story told by wire from Seattle three weeks ago, and also in excess of the previous reports coming along in rotation during the past six weeks, the purchasers represented working down from the Rothschilds to Beit of African hanking fame, and finally to the Alaska-Treadwell syndicate, the natural buyers. Another four weeks' old sale item was dished up again on Wednesday last, after making the rounds of the State, just in time for a split up in the negotiations, which ended the deal in smoke. A small affair where some claims, hounded twelve months ago by Charles Wehh Howard and others, near Grass Valley, is also reported, the price named being $50,000. Captain Thomas Mein, who is accredited with a greater desire to buy than to sell mines just now, is quoted as an owner in this last transaction of the Dodo and Orleans, acquired by the Howard clique. It strikes one that it must have been a good thing, if Mein let go so easily. The same might apply to the Alaska mining sale, the old owners of the property being now engaged in active mining operations themselves, and open to purchase anything which strikes them favorably.

The Pine Street Market. Owing to a more limited range of fluctuations for some days past, dealers have not been able to make so many profitable turns as they did the week before. Con. Cal.-Virginia alone shows any material profits. The increased movement in it was due to the re-commencement of work on the 1550-foot level, where the new strike was made recently. The prospects in this direction are encouraging enough to attract speculation, which is sharpened by the knowledge that the ground now entered is new in every sense of the word, while lying close to the richest and most prolific portion of the old mine. The tone of the other shares was heavy until stimulated by the renewed activity at the North End. The news from Chollar-Brunswick was of the most favorable character, but somehow it does not help the stock out in the way one would naturally expect. The failure to support the shares from the attack of a hear clique some time ago not only shook a great deal of friendly capital out of the market for good, but rendered other dealers timid of similar treatment in the future. The mine certainly makes a remarkably fine showing so far as ore is concerned, much more being extracted than any one dreamed of. In the way of business among the brokers, there is still room for much improvement, but there is a more sanguine feeling evident among them in regard to the future, which seems full of possibilities just now that something will at last turn up to help them out. Old Micawber has many a prototype on the San Francisco Stock Exchange and on Pine street.

A quiet but determined effort is still being made to advance the project of draining American Flat by people who are directly interested in the result. They recognize that it would be of great benefit to Nevada, and likewise to the speculative business in this city. The project should receive the support of every one connected with the mining market. This is doubtful, however. After the Brunswick experience it is difficult to realize that help of any kind can be expected from the Pine street contingent in any event, no matter how important its hearing on the future of the business. A clique of individuals exists which makes its money out of opposition to any movement in the interests of better times. This has had a rather chilling effect on the friends of a more progressive movement and served to detract from any future efforts on their part to build up where so many are ready to tear down. Of late the friends of the business have been in the position of pulling chestnuts out of the fire for other people who, strange to say, have the sympathy of the brokers. It is likely that the attempt will be made to pull the American Flat scheme through. If so, it will be hoped that it will meet a better fate than the Brunswick did. The Comstock Tunnel Company should naturally cut quite an important figure in pushing this work to a successful issue, but of course it will do nothing of the kind under the present management. A shake up in the executive branch of this concern would not be one of the worst things which could take place in the interest of its shareholders.

Awaiting that Powder Compact. Last Saturday was the date fixed by rumor for the consummation of the new powder trust. At least, so it was given out by friends of the Giant combination, and the stock got another boost, as high as $32.50, on the strength of a tip which may have caught some unwary investor, and it may not. In any event, there is no doubting the intentions of the person or persons responsible for magnifying a hoard meeting of one company into a general and decisive meeting of all the companies in the business. The game that has been played in Giant on the local stock hoard is likely to work more injury than good to that concern, before all is said and done. This is not the first time it has been played during the past five or ten years, and this town is too small for deals of a kind which go all right in places like New York or London. There is a wider field to work there, and the losses cannot be located as well as here, where the regular line of investors is as well known as the brokers who represent them. The men who get nipped are invariably heard from in the long run. They are good squealers, even if they are bad speculators. So far, in the matter of past deals, when the clean-up time came, the smooth wire-pullers have always been permitted to get away with the plunder in peace, smiling up their sleeves at the verdant innocence of their victims.

Please Locate These Mines. Can any reader locate the Mammoth Mountain mines in this State, which an attempt is being made to float in London? Information regarding them will be received at this office with thanks.

John Lauer

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

THE disgusting desire to doff the hat, crook the supple knee, and grovel on the belly upon the slightest occasion, which is so pronounced in the great American heart, is brought prominently into view by the treatment accorded the ex-Queen of the Sandwich Islands, who is being queened and royalted by the æsthetic asininity of Boston and Washington just now. The President seized his double-barreled shotgun, fled aboard a revenue cutter, and escaped down the Potomac, when he heard that Lil was headed toward the White House; but there were about her some clinging shreds and patches of former greatness, mostly on the pages of hotel registers and on rudely marked baggage, so the culture of the East prostrates itself and worships. That as a nation we think "all men are created free and equal," is belied whenever a title, no matter however badly battered, drifts across the seas and graciously permits us to lick the dust from its royal boots.

DR. E. H. WOOLSEY, of Oakland, has just discovered that diphtheria bacilli and vaccine germs when acting simultaneously upon the human system are a cure for the former dread disease; and Engineer Schussler learned in Germany on his recent extended tour of water works investigation, that a certain sort of germ is absolutely beneficial to those who unconsciously swallow them. The latest experiment and one of the most important comes from Pennsylvania where an unfortunate man has been caught in an attempt to inoculate his mother-in-law with the diphtheria bacilli, for the purpose of hastening her demise. Thus is the useful sphere of the busy little germ being gradually widened in the cause of science, hygiene and tranquility about the fireside.

GEORGE BROWN, a meat inspector for the United States Bureau of Animal Industry, was committed to jail the other day by a Police Judge for rank perjury on the witness stand. It is understood, however, as is said of elergymen "under fire," that Mr. Brown's usefulness as a meat inspector is in no way impaired by this unfortunate contretemps. Public faith in his tags may remain undiminished, while a firmer feeling will be manifested in the tuberculous meat industry from the time that he returns to the post of duty.

THE alarming statement is made that out of seventeen hundred cows examined by Veterinary Surgeon O'Rourke, three hundred are going off with galloping consumption. Prof. Wenzell, official chemist of the Health Department, has analyzed many articles of food found for sale here, and his reports show that this is a wicked and adulterating generation. The CRIER believes that the purveyors of these fraudulent articles should be choked with their own goods, and the offending dairymen strangled on diseased milk without benefit of either clergy or water.

IT is intimated that the United States Government may interfere to prevent the meeting of Corbett and Fitzsimmons in Nevada. As a relief fund for the needy of the sagebrush State will have to be raised if the mill is suppressed, the TOWN CRIER believes the new industry justifiable upon the common grounds of self-preservation. And then, these sons of pestilence have so long mauled seventy millions of freemen with their jaw-whangings, that we should have a chance to get even.

NOW that the important work of re-distribution of the patronage at the disposal of the Board of Education has been accomplished, the gentlemen will be able to give attention to the less important duties, for which they were elected. The labors of the Board in that patriotic endeavor were very materially lightened by the disinterested suggestions of that excellent citizen, Sam Rainey.

THE State Senate on last Tuesday adopted a resolution ordering the payment of $5.00 per day for water for the use of the upper house. In view of the excessive thirst of the Senators, and their well advertised beer appetite, the expenditure must be considered a shameful waste of the State's funds.

A FURTHER cause that in the ability of what to a ministerial row we officers would take our proof in this city when the Weman's Club building became an accomplished fact. With the sacred portals of that edifice devoted to a feminine, the profane foot of the tyrant man, will make never an echo. From the President of the club down to the janitors, the solitude of sex will reign unbroken. What in heaven's name the Weman's Club will do upon the appearance of the fear-compelling rodent, or the inquisitive burglar, distracted conjecture alone can paint.

THE investigation of Clerk Duckworth at Sacramento need not greatly disturb the security of that pliant servant of his masters. There are few of them who cannot refuse to testify upon the plea of personal incrimination. No law compels a man—even a member of the California Legislature—to swear that he is a scoundrel, and that the truth does not abide in him. Besides, of these last the asseveration would acquire but little weight, as knowledge of them is as general as fleas on a dog's back.

THE Rev. Thomas Dixon, Jr., of New York, declares that a man "would be a fool" to give away a fortune in charity. This is more worldly wise than evangelical. What of the teaching to "sell all that thou hast and give to the poor?" There is very little of the Simon-pure Christianity in these days, and the preachers are as much infected with greed and worldliness as any other class.

MR. David Starr Jordan has just declared that religious excitement is a violent form of intoxication. Inasmuch as it has both financial and physical advantages vastly superior to the tariff levied by John Barleycorn, the TOWN CRIER tenderly commends his numerous friends of the cocktail route to the embrace of the Salvation lassies—bass drum and all.

AMONG his other afflictions and crimes, the wife of the murderer, Butler, has swooped down upon him, bearing means of identification in the shape of a three-year-old boy. By the way, it is observed with astonishment that in the exhibit of the man's belongings—his nether garments and wearing apparel, that the Examiner has overlooked the villain's socks.

AN Oakland paper suggests that the State Capital should be moved from Sacramento to San Francisco. Not so bad as that, misguided friend! We already groan beneath the daily effusions of that s-trumpet of fame, the Examiner. To add the Legislature of a thousand scandals would result in an exodus or an earthquake.

THE TOWN CRIER notes that the Butte hirsute aggregation that was here and played football with the Olympic fellows, are still wailing over the bitter disappointments of New Year's Day. Perhaps they don't really mean it, and are simply kicking to keep in practice for their next appearance.

NOW that the Merchants' Association has cleaned the thoroughfares of San Francisco, it is respectfully suggested that the Supervisors give that organization a lick at the City Hall. The TOWN CRIER will be sworn that there are parts of that building now almost as clean as some of the streets.

THE sneer of the infidel and the wrath of the ungodly is as nothing compared to the ferocity with which the saints of earth rend each other upon the slightest difference of doctrine. The bowels of Jack Satan are as a perpetual fountain of mercy compared to the gnashings of the elect.

A CLEARING house for titles? More's the pity!
The kind we really need beyond all doubt,
Is one through which, in this and every city,
We could compel their owners to "clear out."

THE CRIER hears that the statement made by an indignant citizen to the effect that the only gray matter about the editorial department of the Examiner was located in "Andy's" overcoat, was an error. They have an office cat.

THE zeal of the Examiner for the public good just at this time, is sufficiently pronounced to make every citizen of means and ordinary precaution put a new padlock on his pocket.

THE ART EPICUREAN.

(SECOND PAPER.)

DO you remember a certain Rule of III that used to haunt your rest in early youth like the ghost of an ill-digested dinner in your later years? That same old rule, in different guise, bobs up serenely in every well-regulated man's dining room—know what to eat, when to eat, and how to eat. Therein lies open sesame to benign after-dinner tranquility, and hoist by his own petard is he who disregards it.

Too many men make a sad mistake in the thirdly of my sermon—how to eat. From being gourmets their appetites sometimes coyly lead them to topple over the dividing line, and great is the fall thereof, for then they herd with the gourmands, than whom nothing is more distasteful to the epicure.

But he who observes these three cardinal principles will naturally live to a green old age—not the lean and slippered pantaloons, but the sleek and patent-leathered elderly beau—and smile indulgently at the dyspeptic fairy tales crooned into his ears by his less wise brethren.

A handsome gentleman of this city (I would say "well-preserved" if the term did not sometimes carry a negative compliment which I am far from intending), a wine connoisseur whose well-appointed offices are on Sansome street not far from Pine, but whose modesty will not permit my mentioning his name, has the reputation of being able to order a dinner that cannot be surpassed in any point, and he declares that a mistake often made is in burdening the menu with a plethora of entrees. Usually three or four are considered quite indispensable, and in such cases the following courses receive but scant recognition from the sated diners. His idea, exemplified, by the way, in the recent inaugural dinner given to San Francisco's popular young Mayor, is that one entree, perfect of its kind, is quite sufficient to the epicurean palate, and so he planned the appended menu:

Oysters
Clear Soup
Pompano en papier
Broiled Mushrooms
Canvasback
Carlo Punch
Chicken à la Castilian
Dessert

The punch served as an excuse for a puff or two at a cigarette, without which soothing balm I have heard a man's dinner is treacherously incomplete.

Pompano en papier is a delicacy not frequent in San Francisco, so a description may not come amiss. The fish is shaped something like a barracouta—flat and roundish—and appears in schools off Monterey, occasionally coming up to our own bay. It is smaller and of more delicate flavor than the New Orleans pompano, and lends itself admirably to broiling en papier, a tiny bit of the best olive oil and the paper covering serving to keep the juices well in, when released and ready for the diner with a dash of lime juice or a bottled sauce added, it is pronounced a triumph of culinary art.

The chicken à la Castilian is a sauté with a liberal allowance of pepper entering into its composition, and it is probably so familiar to San Francisco bon vivants that further description is unnecessary. But don't forget the olives and truffles that crown the dish as a Pingat hat crowns a Worth gown.

In selecting mushrooms for broiling, says my informant, care must be used, not necessarily to distinguish them from the sinister toadstool—for every tyro knows that their cooking receptacle being born with a silver spoon in its mouth will settle that difficulty—but in the matter of size. The big, flat chaps with ugly black gills have a finer flavor than the little chubby "buttons," especially for broiling.

At the Burlingame Country Club the members devote considerable time to the supply of the inner man, with a disposition for plain dishes and a leaning toward the grill style for breakfasts and luncheons—breakfast light, luncheon about 1:30 and dinner at 8 o'clock—and it may be a surprise to those who, in their crass ignorance, think the "B'ling'umites" addicted to the flounced and frilled style of menu, to know that, for instance, a dinner might begin with grape fruit, as a substitute of the almost too frequent oyster first course, this appetizer being eaten much as you would eat an orange, with a little sugar and a dash of sherry to perfect the taste. The pièce de résistance in these English dinners is often a saddle of lamb, brought uncarved to the table, its own juice forming the only gravy, and flanked by browned potatoes. Currant jelly is served with it, and the secret of its success lies in the fact that it is cooked for only a small party of diners, and so greater care enters into its preparation.

Burgundy and the French red wine seems to be taking the place, to a large degree, of the effervescent champagne that used to be considered the correct wine for club use. Another innovation, and a strong candidate (not used in the olfactory sense) for favor as an after-dinner cheese, is the Sierra cheese, of local manufacture. It partakes of many of the qualities of the imported Camembert, and epicures have told me, with tears in their eyes, that Camembert's death knell was sounded when Sierra made its appearance on club tables.

But it was a famous salad that I promised you last week, and you shall not be disappointed, mon enfants. Here it is, just as Donald de V. Graham, out of the kindness of his heart and the grey matter of his memory, jotted it down for me, and if you do not make a success of it, just charge it up to your own stupidity.

It was in the Cafe de la Paix that Mr. Graham first met his charmer, and it made such an impression on him that then and there he bade the steward—pardon, garçon (I forgot I was in France) bring forth the ingredients, and so learnt, by mixing it himself, the secret of its success. He calls it Romaine salad (small leaves only.) For six persons.

Three cold chicken livers, mashed into a paste, chives, small amount of chopped green onions, and a tiny bit of chopped parsley. Dress to taste with oil vinegar and a small amount of French mustard. Mix the liver paste first with the mustard, then add the oil and vinegar, and mix the whole, lastly add a tablespoonful of white wine, and I might add, mix again, and yet again. The salad maker should never be in a hurry—it is not good form—for the salad.

On the subject of salads, Mr. Ed. M. Greenway has this sage bit of advice to give—don't make your salad alone to look pretty, but mix the dressing thoroughly into it, not lay a mayonnaise like a pall over the top and refuse acquaintance, until placed on a dish with the underpinning. He can tell you, too, of a mayonnaise of his father's concoction that would make you green with envy, but that is another story.

With terrapin at $130 a dozen—the diamondbacks that must measure exactly nine inches, otherwise the market-man loses tens of dollars for tenths of inches—it is not everybody in this vale of tears that can revel in the luxury of its acquaintance. Much of the so-called terrapin à la Maryland that we praise at the banqueting board, Mr. Greenway, a Maryland gentleman and therefore authority on that as on many other matters, declares is really terrapin à la Philadelphia, for the Maryland style favors the addition of sherry to the tempting dish, while the staid Quaker style frowns upon it.

By the way, Mr. Greenway makes a delicious little edible by taking one-half sweetbreads and one-half the white meat of chicken, mince very fine then add a pinch of mace and cover delicately with egg and breadcrumbs. Use a wire dip net and immerse in boiling fat. The result must be tasted to be appreciated.

There is a certain duck sauce that has received honorable mention from the most critical epicures of this city of club men, and Colonel H. I. Kowalsky has fathered it, and right proud must he be of the offspring of his brain, for the favored few who have tried it say that a duck without it, even of the most aristocratic lineage, is only something to fill a vacuum—comparatively speaking, of course. In spite of the fact that the Colonel is now on the invalid list, under the ban of nurse and physician, he most kindly granted me the privilege of hearing from his own lips the mysterious process of the making of the sauce. But it shall have a more dignified position in these notes than the tail end of a chapter, so have your duck ready for it next week, and if it isn't hot enough for even these tabasco days, you simply have no palate.

AMY L. WELLS.

DEAR EDITH Simplicity is by no means the order of the day this season, as quantities of trimming are used on everything, even the hitherto plain skirts subscribing to this fashion. Variety on all lines is the aim of the dressmaker and modiste, and even the most outré models are accepted, provided they have been evolved by some one with a reputation.

Deep borders of velvet, cut in fanciful fashion, are set on the front breadth of a skirt, or in the case of silk or satin there is much ornamentation in sparkling effects, such as beads, spangles, and cabochons. A gown of unmistakable chic had a skirt of American Beauty satin. Across the front was a band of net thickly embroidered in spangles, while two serpent-like ornaments were set on each side.

Redfern is making short, tight-fitting jackets with a narrow roll of fur, and, perhaps, a flaring collar and revers of fur. A handsome gown emanating from this house is of Russian green lady's cloth, almost as lustrous as satin. The foot of the skirt was bordered narrowly with ermine, and a vest of the fur was let into the waist, with a collar of the same. Ermine bands were at the wrists. This fetching costume was not intended for the street, but was worn at a wedding.

Fur is seen on everything, thick and thin materials alike. On the smooth broadcloths it makes an elegant trimming, and is equally handsome on evening bodices of chiffon, gauze, or velvet. Fluffy mink-tails are set in full plissés of chiffon. They are especially pretty with such light colors as Nile green, baby blue, and pale pink.

Trimmed skirts gain in favor, and the manner of applying the decorations is almost limitless. Arabesque braiding and straight rows and Vandykes of Milan braid are very popular. Stylish cloth skirts are trimmed knee deep, with lines of narrow silk and metal gimp or two-inch bias bands of velvet in a contrasting color, these bands set about an inch and a half apart. Other skirts are trimmed downward from the belt to half the length of the skirt, or else from the skirt edge up, as is most becoming. A pretty effect is produced with braid in two widths, the wider in the center, making three rows on each skirt seam, with a trefoil at the end.

The velvet blouses that fashion affects cannot exactly be called street wraps, but when becoming they are really a better, though a less novel choice, than the bolero jacket. Dark-hued velvet blouses are still worn with handsome cloth skirts, with both house and street costumes. Their simple, severe style remains unchanged, elaboration being exercised in the case of blouses of brocade, satin, or similar light textiles. Modified mutton-leg sleeves, costly buttons, and a very narrow fur roll of the flaring collar and cuffs, form the sole decoration, and frequently the showy buttons are omitted. On theatre blouses of Russian red, green, brown or black velvet, a more ornate style is observable. Tudor or Queen Bess ruffs are employed with additions of creamy lace plaitings or ruffles of mousseline de soie, some of these having tiny clusters of perfumed violets in the heart of each full plait.

Buttons are very large or very small, enameled in wrought metal, hand-painted or jeweled. Splendid ornaments are made as bodice trimmings in opal crystal beads, and gold, silver, and turquoise, or coral, and oxidized silver.

The newest boots are of colored cloths, with the patent leather tops carried up the front. Shoes are less ornate, and made of brocade to match the dresses, or of white or colored kid.

BELINDA.

"What's in a name?" There is a great deal in a name when it applies to liquors. The popularity of "Argonaut" whiskey with connoisseurs means purity, flavor and quality. Once tasted its peculiarly rich flavor is never forgotten. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, are the Pacific Coast Agents.

AN ANCIENT CUSTOM

FROM THE IDLER

Geoffrey Withers had not written much, but he had written well, and mainly to please himself and those few, his friends, who, of a like mind with his own, admired his works. He had published three romantic dramas in slim volumes, printed on hand-made paper; a symbolist novel with three characters only, who never met each other, but whose lives were lived out under identical conditions, with varying but typical results; and his last book consisted of seven essays called respectively, "The Lost Sense," "The Epigenetic Theory of Passion," "Pale Phantoms of the Past," "The Nearer Way," "Nature the Unnatural," "The World's Youth," and "Eternal Boyhood." By these things he had gained his friends, but his wife he had won by his beauty.

There is a beauty which is never old, a beauty whose changes are as imperceptible as the changes of a blue sky on a still and cloudless day, and a beauty which belongs not only to the face, but to the whole body, and such was the possession of Geoffrey Withers, and had been his for all those years which had passed over his head without altering the color or the texture of its hair. He was not young when he met the girl who became his wife, but he seemed to be youth embodied; not the robustness of youth, or its mere strength and carelessness, but the soul of youth, the central, undying principle of youthhood, and it was irresistible. He never loved his wife, neither did he or had he loved any other woman, in the manner in which the love of a man for a woman is generally understood, for his only love was for the embodiment within himself, of which he was perfectly conscious. Women had loved him, and he had shared their passion and had been happy in doing so, and had made them happy. The bond which held him to his wife was such, and she for her part regarded him with worship which was accepted by him with apparent unconsciousness.

They had met at the house of one of his friends whose guests they were: she had been staying with his friend's sister some weeks when he arrived, and in that time she had read his books, one of them inscribed to this friend, all of them presentation copies. When Joyce Joicey met their author she knew that she would never love any other man. Joyce was an artist and was very rich, and Withers knew it to be unlikely he would ever meet a woman less calculated to disturb the faith he had in the system of life which he had created for himself, and they were married.

The house they found for themselves in the wild, moorland highlands of the southern part of the Peak was built early in the sixteenth century, and successive owners of it had time after time added to its beauty. Geoffrey Withers and his wife made it still more beautiful within; without it was perfect, as was also the park by which it was environed and the woods which enclosed it from the world. Geoffrey had no definite intention of ever again publishing anything he might write: his wife and his friends might read in the manuscript pages all that he might produce, and he would be content with so restricted a public. For the rest he lived in the serenity of the present; in the beauty of his wife, in her wonderful mastery of the more than one musical instrument which were to be found in this remote and quiet home.

Time slowly and surely ran on, and the life at Badlesmere Hall was seemingly unchanged, save by the occasional coming and going of those friends cherished by Geoffrey and his wife, and by even more than occasional visits to these friends. The household moved with a reflection of the serenity which characterized its head. The servants, even, of whom there were several, seemed to have assimilated the spirit of the place: they had been carefully chosen. They were not young, with the exception of one, whose position was more than a servant, but less than an equal. She was Mrs. Withers' companion, a sweet-natured girl named and called Marian in that intimacy into which she was admitted by those two, who never allowed her to think of her dependency. She had quiet, luminous eyes, often filled with a great affection. She gradually became an essential portion of the life at the Hall. Less passionate than her mistress, she was even more affectionate in her disposition, and while not demonstrative, easily conveyed the love which she felt. Geoffrey Withers was to her an object to adore, and to be near him was a painful joy.

There came a time for Marian when joy for the most part gave place to pain, and in the secure secrecy of her bedroom, hidden away in one corner of the beautiful old Hall, such unhappiness filled her heart that it was sorrowfully near to breaking. Her anguish became harder to bear when Joyce Withers, with a holy smile of shame and love, placed soft linen in her hands and bade her cut and sew as she should direct. Then in the long nights of winter, when the wind spoke to her from the other side of her curtained window, Marian's passion of weeping knew no cessation, and her shame had no outlet. But Joyce's eyes were too full of the light of a greater happiness to notice that her companion's were too incessantly bent over the fine work her fingers accomplished, and Geoffrey gave no sign.

Soon, from the neighboring county came an addition to the housekeeper's table, and garrulous Mistress Gutterige talked mysteriously to Miss Woodnott who kept house, and who now more than ever held sway over the Hall. Then came a day when all was bustling within, and harnessing of horses without. Marian's work had some time been finished, and she was alone with her misery, and unoccupied. Her grief no longer escaped her in tears, but dry-eyed she sat at her window and gazed across the park, where the spirit of spring was at work at its annual task of re-awakening.

A tapping at the door came as dusk stole over the land: all noises were hushed now, and a calm was within the Hall. Marian started and opened the door, and a maid there with a coy smile said:

"If you please, Mistress Gutterige would speak with you in Madam's bedroom."

A great trembling seized upon Marian, and she fell on her knees by her little white bed before she left the room. Silently then she stole along the passages until upon the threshold of the chamber she had been bidden to, she paused and held her hand to her heart. Then she gave a still, small knock upon the panel, and the door was opened by Mistress Gutterige, who, with a beaming countenance, invited her to enter the room, where the shaded candles gave a subdued light.

"Come in, miss," said Mistress Gutterige, "I want you to help with an ancient custom of my own country-side, and Madam was kindly willing," turning towards the great, black-oak bed, where Marian saw her mistress lying with a pale, beautiful, and lappy face.

"In Yorkshire, you know," continued the nurse, "we always give the baby into the hands of a maid, ere ever any one else may touch it. Here, miss, is a bonny boy, and you shall be the first to hold it in your arms. God bless it, the gallous little rogue."

Marian took the child, and with a strength, the source of which she knew not, kissed its face and then quietly walked to the bed, and, placing it in the arms of its mother, kissed her too on the forehead, and then turned and left the room.

Outside the door her fictitious strength was gone: she stumbled along the corridor and then consciousness departed, and she felt herself falling, always towards nothing. When she opened her eyes she found her master bending over her, and she felt the impact of his kiss upon her lips, and shuddered and lay still, too helpless to move.

"Marian," said Geoffrey, in his beautiful voice, "what has happened to you? Was the room so hot? I was waiting jealously for you to come away, and was just in time to save you from falling."

"I shall be well in a moment," said the girl, in a brave and pitiful way, "do not wait, go to your wife, she is expecting you, and you wish to see your son."

"Well, dear girl, if you are better I will, but stay here until I return," and Geoffrey Withers went to join his wife and child, glowing with the pleasure of a somewhat unpleasant and dangerous episode well and safely passed.

Marian speedily rose from the couch on which she had been lying and went to her room. But a little while after, when everyone at Badlesmere Hall was concerned with the great news, the birth of the heir, she stole forth, and the moors knew her that night, and by the morrow she was far away.

Geoffrey Withers and his wife never ceased to regret the strange disappearance of Marian, and had it not been for the absorption in the baby which Mrs. Withers felt at the time, she would have been very unhappy. Geoffrey always regards it as the most unpleasant of the very few unpleasant features of his singularly serene existence.

INSURANCE.

THE general agency of the Sun Insurance office for the Pacific Coast has just been placed in the hands of Mr. W. J. Callingham, at 420 California street. This company enjoys the distinction of being the oldest, and it is the largest purely fire insurance company in the world. It was established in 1710, and its offices are to be found in every part of the civilized world. The transfer of the Coast agency to Mr. Callingham is an event of much importance in the insurance field. The agency extends as far East as Colorado, and takes in Alaska and the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. Callingham has been prominently and successfully identified with insurance on this Coast for the past twenty-eight years, and is at present the general agent of the Orient of Hartford. Under the new management the policy of the Sun and Orient will be broad and comprehensive, both as to hazards and limitations as to lines.

It is rumored quietly on the street that Col. Macdonald intends to resign from the State militia.

Mr. Ed. Niles, formerly at the head of the Pacific Insurance Union, but at present connected with the North British and Mercantile, has written a very interesting sketch for the Insurance Standard, of Boston. The article is of superior merit, and there is no doubt that the "Evolution of Johnson" will be widely copied by insurance papers.

Mr. F. G. Voss, the United States manager of the Thuringia Insurance Company, of Germany, with headquarters in Chicago, was in the city last week. He still retains his interest in the firm of Voss, Conrad & Co. in San Francisco. He is one of the young men in the business who has very rapidly risen.

The annual dinner of the Fire Underwriters' Association of the Pacific will be held on the 16th inst. Many papers of interest are being prepared for that occasion, which will, as usual, be followed by a swell banquet.

There appears to be excellent foundation for the report that there will soon be a general shake up and change of the prominent personnel in several of the large fire insurance companies in this city. The changes may be reasonably charged to the long-continued rate war.

Is it a remarkable coincidence, or the result of other causes, that in the annual statements of the insurance companies, the home institutions make a better showing than the Eastern or foreign companies?

From present indications it does not appear that there will be much legislation affecting insurance enacted at Sacramento this year.

Col. L. L. Bromwell visited the State Capital last week.

IN view of the number of wet days we have had this week, it is perhaps fortunate that teas have been rather shelved of late, for, as a rule, ladies do not care to risk the dampening of their plumes and the ruin of their silks and velvets by going out in the rain to even so fascinating an entertainment as a tea. Dinners and dances have been the leading events of the week, with a wedding or two thrown in to balance the scale. Both Army and Navy have contributed their quota to the festive doings of the week—the Navy through the dinner given by the officers of the Perry on Monday evening, as a farewell to their friends prior to the departure of their vessel North, and the Army by means of the delightful hop at the Presidio on Tuesday evening, which quite equalled any given at that post for a long period, and that is saying a good deal, as the officers of the departed Fifth Artillery were regarded by our belles as ideal hosts. Mrs. Henry Scott's dance was one of the pleasantest of the season, and as one of the few hostesses who have provided that kind of entertainment for her guests this winter, she deserves the especial thanks of the buds.

Miss Della Davidson has been most warmly welcomed home again by her numerous acquaintances in San Francisco, and been a guest at most of the functions which have taken place since her return. She divided the honors with Miss Kate Salisbury at the yellow and lavender luncheon given by Mrs. Eyre at the University Club, was the chief guest at Mrs. Southard Hoffman's tea, and was the partner selected by Mr. Greeuway for leading the cotillion of the Friday Night Club, which was danced at Odd Fellows' Hall last night.

The Clericos' Club, composed of the Episcopal clergy of the city, had their annual dinner at the Occidental on Monday evening; the second of Mrs. Moses Heller's dinner parties excelled, if such a thing were possible, in beauty of decoration the first of the series; on this occasion thirty-six guests were entertained; and Mr. and Mrs. Steifel, née Schweitzer, gave a theatre and elaborate supper party to the members of their recent wedding party. Mr. and Mrs. Steifel are at the Palace Hotel on a brief visit, prior to their departure for New York, where they will in future reside.

The Simpson tea is the principal event on the programme for to-day. One of the pleasant affairs named for to-night is the Bachelors' theatre party arranged by twenty-five of the young members of the San Francisco Verein Club, and to which a corresponding number of young ladies are invited. The chaperones are Mesdames Wm. and Marcus Gerstle and Mrs. W. Frias, and the elaborate supper which follows will be served at the club.

The last meeting of the Friday Fortnightlies was a particularly pleasant affair. Lieutenant Bent, who led the cotillion, had Miss Ida Gibbons for his partner, and several very pretty figures were danced. The fancy dress cotillion of the Entre Nous Club the same evening, at the Palace Hotel, was a brilliant success; the costumes were varied and handsome, among the prettiest worn by the ladies being those which represented Battledore and Shuttlecock, Forget-me-not, Fickle Fortune, and the California Poppy. The cotillion of the Saturday Night Club the following evening was led by Howard Adams, and three new figures were danced.

The ball given last Saturday night at the Palace Hotel by Mrs. Joseph, for the début of her daughter Nellie, was a very handsome one. The decorations of the reception room were of bamboo, palms, and almond blossoms; in Maple Hall, green and pink were the dominating tints, ferns, buckleberry vines, and ribbons being used most artistically, producing a charming result. Here took place the dancing, which was the chief pleasure of the evening, though doubtless by some the magnificent supper which was served at midnight, was so regarded, after which dancing was again in order. Mrs. Joseph wore a gown of yellow brocaded satin, combined with black and adorned with Marechal Neil roses. Miss Joseph's lovely costume was of white satin, trimmed with bands of white velvet, and the floral adornments were lilies of the valley. The toilets of all the ladies present were remarkably handsome.

Our Jewish residents have rather monopolized the weddings this week, first on the list coming the marriage of Miss Sady Hyman and Wilfred Mack, which took place at the San Francisco Verein Club on Wednesday. Miss Agnes Hyman attended her sister as maid of honor, and Eugene Korn supported the groom as his best man. In the evening, Miss Hattie Bloomfield and George Klein were the bride and groom, the ceremony being performed at the home of the bride's mother on Gough street. On Thursday evening Miss May Scott and N. H. Castle were united in marriage by the Rev. E. J. Lion, at the Scott residence on Vallejo street. The bride's sisters, the Misses Laura and Kittie Scott, officiated as her bridesmaids, and Jack Casserley as best man to the groom.

Among the Easter weddings will be that of Miss Jessie Coleman and Harry Knowles, both of whom are almost as well known on this side of the bay as in Oakland, which is their home. It promises to be a brilliant affair, and is already a much-discussed topic in social circles.

Golden and silver wedding anniversary celebrations are taking quite a prominent part in the festivities of the month. On Thursday, Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Spitz celebrated in an elaborate manner, at the Concordia Club rooms, their fifty years of married life, and the supper was a veritable feast. On Tuesday, the 14th, Mr. and Mrs. A. Roos, who are renowned for the magnificence of their entertainments, will celebrate their silver wedding anniversary by giving a dinner at the Palace Hotel, to which a hundred guests will be bidden, and later in the evening there will be a ball, for which a large number of invitations have been issued.

The "last dances of the season" are being announced by the different clubs which have been such factors in the gaieties of the present season. The Monday Night Club has named Monday evening, the 15th, as the date for their final meeting this season; the Friday Night Cotillion Club has its last dance at Odd Fellows' Hall on the evening of the 19th; the last Friday Fortnightly will take place on the evening of the 12th, but they will give a ball after Lent; so also will the Entre Nous Club, whose last ante-Lenten dance will be given on the 2nd of March; the Saturday Night Cotillion Club ends its season on the evening of April 23d. The Deux Temps Club, of Oakland, will soon be among the things of the past, the members having decided to disband. So the dance to be given next Tuesday week, the 16th, will be the last one of that once popular organization. The reception and ball to be given at the Concordia Club on the 20th promises to be a brilliant affair. The programme for the earlier part of the evening will consist of a vaudeville performance, in which men only will take part, and later there will be supper and dancing.

There have been many pleasant gatherings at the Hotel Rafael, especially since it has come under the control of Major Warfield, but it is doubtful if a daintier repast has ever been spread than was the recent dinner given by Emerson Warfield in celebration of his natal day. The pity of it was that it should have been a stag affair, but twenty of his young men friends were delightfully entertained on that occasion.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Castle have returned from their trip to Europe, and are at the Richelieu. They arrived on Monday last, reaching here in time for the wedding of their nephew, Neville Castle, with Miss May Scott.

Hadn't you better get the best tea there is going?

Schilling's Best—your grocer pays you back your money in full if you don't like it.

Our absent medicos are coming back to us. Dr. and Mrs. Kahn, who have been spending several months in Europe, are among the arrivals of the week, and Dr. and Mrs. Breyfogle are en route, having arrived in New York from Southampton. Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young are also en route homewards from Paris and Berlin. Mr. and Mrs. E. Lillenthal have also arrived here this week. The recently arrived U. S. A. Chief Quartermaster and wife, Colonel and Mrs. Moore, are guests at the Occidental.

A special feature of Washington's birthday celebration this year will be the banquet of the Sons of Revolutionary Sires. The committee having the affair in charge has shown marked zeal and arranged for a brilliant demonstration. The members of the Society of Sons will banquet at the expense of the Society and will have the privilege of inviting guests at their own individual expense. If the present idea is carried out the banquet will probably be the finest ever given in this city on Washington's birthday. The banquet will be held at the Occidental.

On next Wednesday evening, the 10th inst., the Doctor's Daughters, of Dr. Mackenzie's church, will give a musical at the residence of Mrs. B. F. Norris, 1822 Sacramento street. As the entire membership of this most excellent association are taking an active interest in the entertainment, a delightful concert is assured. The proceeds will be devoted to the cause in which these ladies are interested. Tickets of admission may be had of any of the members for seventy-five cents, which includes refreshments.

A most enjoyable presentation of Much Ado About Nothing was given last evening at Linderman's hall, Alameda, in aid of the Woman's Relief Corps, under the competent direction of Mrs. Melville-Snyder. The various characters were excellently sustained by those appearing. The entertainment was a pronounced success, largely attended.

Arrangements are being made for a delightful concert to take place on Thursday evening, the 18th, inst at Golden Gate hall, in aid of the furnishing fund of St. Paul's Episcopal Church. In addition to the concert Gibson's pictures will be given, to be followed by dancing. Tickets are 50 cents, to be had at Sherman and Clay's.

Dr. B. Apple of this city left for New York last Tuesday evening on his way to Heidelberg, where he goes for the purpose of taking a post graduate course in medicine.

Colonel J. G. C. Lee, who has been stationed here for the past three years, and Mrs. Lee, left for Chicago on Monday last, where Colonel Lee has been ordered for duty.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Van Bergen leave to-day on an extended trip through Europe.

G. A. MOORE and Edward Polhemus, known by firm name as E. L. G. Steele & Co., who some time ago obtained an award of $871.63 against Lievre, Fricke & Co., for infringement of trade mark, on Wednesday brought suit to set aside the judgment, owing to a very strong suspicion that they had received unfair treatment by the board of arbitration. Steele & Co. propose to very thoroughly investigate and review the case.

IT is understood that Mr. C. H. Morey, a prominent merchant of Stockton, is named in connection with the Mayoralty at the approaching municipal election. Mr. Morey is a Republican, a strong man, and his practical business ability would prove a valuable aid in the management of the affairs of that bustling city.

An Eminent Establishment.

The cellars of Messrs. Moët & Chandon, the largest champagne house in the world, contain over eight miles of walks, and about twenty-six million bottles champagne. The different sections of the vast cellars are named after the various countries to which shipments are made. Russia and England occupy the largest space, the special provision having been made for the requirements of the Courts.—Hotel Gazette.

If you wish your dinners, breakfasts or banquets to be successes place the whole matter in the hands of Max Abraham, the Caterer, 428 Geary Street. Mr. Abraham's experience in such matters is a guarantee of satisfaction in every detail and he has charge of the largest functions given by society folk in this city. His reputation is national.

If you're a butcher, you want Pearline for the proper washing of your frocks and aprons, and to keep the benches, blocks, floors, shelves, hooks, etc., as clean as they ought to be.

There's nothing that will do this like Pearline. And it takes so little time, and trouble and work that there's no excuse for not doing it. Keep everything dainty and sweet and clean with Pearline.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 508 JAMES PYLE, New York.

AT long last the style of Mrs. Hager's promised "surprise" party is being discussed in the swim. As a general thing, this hospitable matron indulges in entertainments that are out of the common, and usually the event of the gay season each winter. This year, society has been patiently waiting to know what form her function would take. No one seems positive on the subject, but it is being more than whispered it will be a children's party, modeled after the recent affair given in New York, where our pretty California helle, Miss Virginia Fair, made a great success as "a little girl with a curl."

At Golden Gate Hall, on Friday, the 29th ult., Mr. Hugo Herold sang through his recital of eleven songs and their attendant encores in a whole bunch of keys, none of which was attuned to the piano accompaniment patiently contributed by Miss Genevieve Moroney. Mr. Roderick Herold played the piano with an unimpassioned correctness of time and touch in no wise changed from the manner of his earlier concert days, and Signor Minetti, violinist, was not heard at his best. That the concert was not a success is deeply deplored by the friends of Mr. Herold, who hold the young man in high esteem, and respect the good old name he bears; but the kindest and warmest of them all admit that Mr. Herold's barytone is false, his method abominable, and his pretensions to the concert stage the most unfortunate thing that could have happened to him.

The friends of Mrs. Huntington are trying to persuade her to give a costume ball after Lent, as her hall room would afford such a good opportunity to display elegant dress. Appropos of which, the guests of the Hotel Rafael are said to be meditating a novel entertainment in the near future. So many of our fashionable set are frequent visitors to that favorite hostelry from time to time that any affair of such nature would be sure of a swell attendance from the city, as well as the numerous house parties in the Valley.

One of the weeklies sometimes takes occasion to remark on the tendency of our young ladies who go abroad who have forgotten their native English, and do not speak correctly their imported French. We would not for a moment suppose they referred to a near relative of a high official on that paper, who was abroad last summer, and while in Paris went into an establishment devoted to ladies' lingerie, and in her best French asked for a "chemin-de-fer," and was politely told in English that "they did not keep railroads."

Much interest is manifested and curiosity felt as to the coming amateur performance of Caste, for charity. Miss Rose Hooper's talent as an actress is already an established fact; so is that of Frank Mathieu. Miss Leila Burton is known to be an elocutionist of great promise, while Charley Dickman is sure to make Eccles a funny creation. That society will turn out in force to greet them is a foregone conclusion.

The girls are in raptures over the idea of Lieutenant Fred Sladen's being ordered here to report to Colonel Shafter for examination for promotion; for that handsome young officer made many a heart flutter during his brief visit from the north, when he came to officiate as best man at the Lord-Haydon wedding a few years back.

NOTHING counts in New York just now but the Seeley dinner—burlesqued at the Olympia as the Silly dinner—which in fact it was and nothing worse. It is popular just now with a certain class of people to denounce Seeley and his guests, but I happen to know a man who was at this celebrated dinner and who has assured me that there was absolutely no cause for criticism—that nothing was said or done which has not been frequently suggested on the variety stage. There has been one result to the investigation and that is the determination of the entire Seeley family to migrate. They refuse to linger longer in this miscalled land of the free—and they and their millions will betake themselves to foreign shores as soon as the legal proceedings are settled. They have no more use for America—and indeed in view of the facts—a more high-handed and insolent proceeding has never been known than this same Chapman raid—about which historians do not differ.

Invitations are out for the marriage on the third of February of Reginald Foster and Miss Kitty Hayden, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Brace Hayden. The wedding will be celebrated at St. Thomas' Church in Fifth avenue, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and will be followed by a small reception. Max Foster, austere known as Maximilian, will be his brother's best man. The two young Fosters have been in journalism here for several years, I understand. Their mother will be remembered as Miss Leila Love, a daughter of General Love in San Francisco.

Sir Bache and Lady Cunard have been cordially entertained since their arrival in New York. The lovely Maud Burke has not been forgotten by her Californian friends. Miss Furniss, one of the very old set in New York, gave them a dinner on Thursday. Mr. and Mrs. James Roosevelt were their host and hostess on the following night. Mr. and Mrs. Forhes Leith received them at dinner last night, when Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Peters, Mrs. Martin and others were among the guests. Mr. and Mrs. Jimmie Lake have returned to New York after a visit to Philadelphia. Mrs. Bradley is at the Hotel Walton in Philadelphia, and her daughter, Mrs. Wallace, is in that city under the care of the celebrated Dr. Weir Mitchell.

To-night Miss Mollie Torhert and George Underwood Kirkpatrick were wed in All Angels Church. The bride was a vision of beauty in her trailing satin and tulle. There were no bridesmaids, Mrs. Snyder being her sister's only attendant. A reception at Sherry's followed the ceremony, which was performed by the Very Rev. Dean Hoffman.

Mrs. Ernest La Montague gave a large opera party on Wednesday night, followed by a supper.

The celebrated Mrs. Hoffman-Martin, of San Francisco, has again been distinguishing herself, and has the satisfaction of having interrupted Miss Margaret Mather's initial performance of Cymbeline, by having her leading man arrested. Mrs. Martin conceived some time ago the plan of giving a hall fit for the suffering Cuhans. The occasion gave her a long-sought and yearned-for opportunity of starring. Mr. Henley was engaged as leading man and was paid fifty dollars as a retainer. He left the combination and there was a delay in his return of the aforesaid magnificent sum, hence the arrest. Henley is bent upon revenge.

Dr. and Mrs. Breyfogle sailed from Southampton to-day and will go directly to San Francisco on their arrival.

Mrs. Dick Lounsherry gave a large tea yesterday. Mrs. George Rutledge Gibson will give a large and formal dinner on Monday night.

WHEN ALL THE WORLD IS YOUNG, LAD.—CHARLES KINGSLEY.

When all the world is young, lad,
And all the trees are green;
And every goose a swan, lad,
And every lass a queen;
They hey for boot and horse, lad,
And around the world away;
Young blood must have its course, lad,
And every dog his day.

When all the world is old, lad,
And all the trees are brown;
And all the sport is stale, lad,
And all the wheels run down,
Creep home and take your place there,
The spent and maimed among;
God grant you find one face there
You loved when all was young.

IN BRIGHTER DAYS.—EDWARD MOYLE COOPER, IN PALL MALL MAGAZINE.

In brighter days, when came the Spring,
We loved to see the sun's clear rays,
To hear the merry finnets sing—
In brighter days.

But now, when childhood's happy days
Have vanished nothing, save the sting
Of memory remains. Now days
Are dark and drear; Death's gloomy wing
Is flapping close, and dumb my lays,
Ah, well-a-day, we had our fling
In brighter days!

AT THE RACES.

A tont sat up in a grandstand chair,
He had fringe on his pants, and hay in his hair;
And he nodded his head with a confident air.
He can win in a walk, by gee.

Can he win it? Why, how can he lose!
He's out of Babe Murphy, by Osdler Joe,
And a crackerjack, sure; just see him go—
He can win in a walk, by gee.

They're off! Just you watch now and see.
He leads at the half; I told you so.
What? Beat in the stretch? Well he's off to-day
Or he'd have won in a walk, by gee.

The plaint of this doggerel is heard on every track from Maine to California, and it was never rehearsed with greater propriety or pith than when old Senator Grady was beaten out by Monita at Ingleside last Tuesday. Never were the uncertainties of the race track more clearly demonstrated than when this former great horse was defeated by an unknown plug. Age tells on animals as it does on men, as was shown at New Orleans the other day when Ida Pickwick, the daughter of imp. Mr. Pickwick, and one of the greatest mares of her day, was out-classed in a genuine skate race.

That celebrated derby winner, Oregon Eclipse, finally fell into the hands of John Robbins, who raced him in and out of season until he dropped dead. But it is not often that such cases of brutality are recorded. Down at Palo Alto at the Stanford breeding farm, where old Palo Alto lies buried, over his vacant stall reads this inscription: "Sacred to the memory of Palo Alto, record 2:08 1/4;" and they never will fill that stall again.

The Tarpey Stakes at Ingleside on Saturday were won in race-horse style by Schiller, who beat Colonel Burns's Sweet Favordale and St. Lee. In the purse race on Tuesday, Baldwin's Argentina bested Hobart's Bright Phœbus; but Phœbus could have won with a better boy up. The three good horses—Schiller, St. Lee and the Dragon—are half brothers.

NUMEROUS and sincere expressions of sympathy are heard in many quarters for Mr. Will E. Fisher, whose financial and domestic misfortunes have recently been brought to public notice. Mr. Fisher has been known in this city for a long time. He is recognized as generous-hearted; an honest and capable business man, of large transactions and undeniable ability. The idle stories that he had left the city, fleeing from his creditors, have been proved false by his return, and the avowed determination that he will use every honorable effort to straighten out his tangled affairs and be found hard at work to retrieve his fallen fortunes. Domestic troubles have been added to his burdens, but it is his earnest desire that these differences may be arranged, and complete happiness restored in his family. In his manly determination and efforts Mr. Fisher has the best wishes, as he still holds the confidence of a host of friends.

THE location of an ambulance station at the park fully equipped to care for all cases of injury, meets with general commendation. Such a need had been apparent for years, and for thus intelligently meeting it the health department and Park Commissioners have the thanks of the discriminating public.

THE statement of President Newhall, of the Presidio and Ferries Railroad, at Sacramento last week, that his line had not paid a dividend in six years, and that last year it ran at an actual loss of $2,500, should give pause to the game of "cinch" in the shape of a bill for 2 1/2 cent fares now before the Legislature. The clamor for this sweeping reduction is not the result of a healthy sentiment. President Newhall shows that it would be impossible to operate his road at all and make such a ruinous cut in fares. Another thing: Owing to the extensive trausfer system here, some of the lines are now getting much less than 2 1/2 cents for hauling passengers.

THE expected has occurred in the case of Chief Clerk Duckworth, pay-roll stuffer, and political debt-payer to the honorable members of the Legislature. His offense lay in a too willing obedience in serving his masters. Ninety per cent. of that fraudulent pay-roll was the direct result of their requests, entreaties, and finally, demands. The investigation, had it been searching, would have painted too many the Duckworth hue. Under the circumstances, there is room for reasonable doubt whether the legislators did not pursue a more manly course in standing by him. Turning State's evidence is usually held a blacker crime than the original offense.

THERE is pressing need of vigorous and rigid regulation of the army of alleged dermatologists, face doctors, skin renewers, and physical renovators in San Francisco, who frequently defraud the female searchers after beauty of their money, and what is a far more serious, result, often inflict great injury upon the faces of them. Rarely does a week pass that some woman, who has fallen foul of one of these quacks masquerading as a beauty doctor, does not find it necessary to seek a physician to repair her swollen and badly damaged face. We should have laws compelling these purveyors of eternal beauty of the female face divine, to meet certain requirements and obtain licenses to do business, as a protection to the beauty-seeking public.

IF something be not soon done, we shall be unable to see the houses of San Francisco because of the advertising boards. The average citizen has long borne in silent misery the defacement of dead walls and sides of unoccupied buildings by unsightly advertisements. But now that this nuisance threatens the lives of people, it is time to enter a vigorous protest. These bill boards are being pushed up from twenty to thirty feet above the sidewalks, and as they are thrown together in the flimsiest and cheapest manner possible, a little gust of wind would hurl them into the street, to inflict serious, perhaps fatal, injuries upon the unfortunate passer-by. The limit of safety, to say nothing of decency, has long been passed in this business, and a general law should cut down by two-thirds the height of these walls—at present a menace to life and limb.

THE measure before Congress prohibiting the sale of goods made by the convict labor of one State in any other State, should become a law. Going a step further, the sale of goods made by convict labor, anywhere, aside from those of a limited public character, should be stopped. In California the jute mills and the State's roads afford almost the only opportunity for convict labor, not inconsistent with the general welfare.

THE unsavory rumors that have surrounded the Mission-street high school contract, and which began with the purchase of the ground for the building, reached an acute phase last week in the larceny of the plans and specifications for the construction of the house. The fact that the papers returned to the office of the Secretary of the Board of Education as mysteriously as they departed, is not reassuring. There must have been an intent in the theft, and as there were ugly insinuations heard when the contract was let, it is altogether probable that the public, as usual in such cases, will find to its cost later that there was some fraudulent design in this theft of these papers.

REPRESENTATIVE NORTH, of Alameda, gave a very clear exhibition of the breadth, height and depth of his statesmanship at Sacramento last Tuesday. The House was in committee of the whole, having under discussion the labor bill. The Alameda statesman alluding to the present labor commissioner, said that he was a competent and conscientious man, but that he was a Democrat, which fact was quite enough to cause his removal. Elevation of the public service in the light of such patriotic inspiration as is breathed forth by Statesman North becomes, indeed, a simple proposition.

ANY effort to impose useless burdens upon foreign corporations doing business in this State cannot be justified upon economic grounds. The bill before the Legislature requiring foreign insurance companies doing business here to have on deposit, in some State, $200,000, may be regarded somewhat in that light. The protection of policy holders is of the highest importance, but a deposit of $50,000, when the company, without respect to its cash deposit in the United States, is known to be financially sound, should cover all reasonable requirements. That sum maintained unimpaired should be accepted as a sufficient guarantee of good faith and ability to meet all the usual exigencies of business.

THERE is no doubt that the single aged capitalist always affords a shining mark to widows of uncertain and impecunious age; and many a fat compromise has been effected where courageous resistance would have defeated the designs of the dishonest. In all these cases of alleged private contract marriages, any proof, other than that instant and complete, is open to much suspicion. The incentive upon the part of designing women to attack the fortune of wealthy old men is great, because it is unattended usually by punishment of any kind, and for the further reason that it is comparatively easy to manufacture corroborative testimony. Take the Quackenbush case. It is possible that the claim of Mrs. Abbott, who says she is the contract wife of the aged capitalist, may be valid; but it is easy to see how such a case might be built up and prepared, to spring after his death, with considerable hope of success. Quackenbush accidentally heard of the existence of such papers, as he asserts, and immediately gave battle. His vigorous contest commends him to general public opinion as being the victim of great attempted wrong.

WHY THE COURTS ARE CONGESTED, AND THE NEEDED RELIEF.

IT seems as if this Legislature is going to meddle with the law Courts only to muddle them. Of the existing condition of confusion in litigation there can be no manner of doubt. That a remedy is badly needed is equally certain. But then it is very possible to render the existing "confusion worse confounded," and that is what the best authorities agree would result from the adoption of any one of the proposals now under consideration at Sacramento. One of the very worst of these, as, perhaps, might have been expected, is that which has emanated from the Bar Association of this city. Lawyers in practice are not calculated to make very good law reformers, nor to very ardently desire to reduce litigation to a minimum. Their interest naturally lies the other way. At the same time it is only just to the higher and better class of attorneys in our midst to say that they are not the moving spirits of the local Bar Association. They have not the time to attend to its affairs, and, as a consequence, it is run by men, worthy enough in their way, but who are in no sense representative of their more fully employed, experienced, and abler brethren. That is not a remedy for existing ills which gives two chances for appeals where only one is now possible. The principal evil to be cured is the overcrowding of the Supreme Court Calendar to a degree that the Judges cannot, or at least, do not cope with. The Court is two years behind its work, with no apparent chance of overtaking it. To delay justice is in many cases to deny it. Defendants die, and so do witnesses, besides, losing parties are very given to becoming bankrupt, if time enough be allowed them, and in that case, of course, the winning side, which is presumably the right side, loses its damages, as well as its time and costs. For every reason appeals ought to be promptly heard and determined.

The Bar Association's proposed remedy is the creation of three new Courts of appeal; the State being divided into three judicial districts, with an appellate court, consisting of three Judges, in each. As these Courts are not to have final jurisdiction, but may be appealed from to the existing Supreme Court, it is difficult to see where the reform comes in, or how finality is to be reached more speedily than now. The probability would seem to be that the proceedings would be more cumbrous, and longer drawn out. They would certainly be more costly. It is not to be supposed that litigants, as a rule, would rest satisfied with the decision of the intermediate Court, whilst the one of last resort remained to be heard from. We are a litigious people, and, when we go to law, are accustomed to fight to the bitter end. Moreover, law, with its uncertainties, is in most instances only a game of chance, and no good gambler ever quits whilst he still holds a possibly winning card. Every possible case would still be taken to the higher Court, and the congested condition of its calendar would continue. There would be more work for the lawyers, nine more judges, and Heaven only knows how much more expense. It is a lawyer's bill through and through. It is said that nothing else is possible without a constitutional amendment for which we shall have to wait two years. The present Supreme Court, being a creation of the Constitution, it cannot be remodelled or otherwise interfered with by the Legislature alone. The people must be consulted before anything can be done. It is well that it should be so. It would be destructive of the necessary independence of the highest Appellate Court if it could be tampered with by every chance majority in the Legislature. If the working strength of the Court must be added to, let an amendment be voted upon by the people, creating three more judges, and constituting a third department.

What is really needed, as the NEWS LETTER has more than once pointed out, is not an increase of judges and courts of which there are all too many already, but a decrease in the amount of litigation. It would seem at first sight as if that were a matter the Legislature could not control, but the fact is otherwise. By adopting the practice of older States and countries, litigation would soon be so reduced in volume that the existing Courts would be enabled to dispose of it easily. The truth is that the lawyers have been permitted to build up a system of practice in this State which really offers a premium to litigation.

It is often cheaper to litigate an honest claim than to promptly pay it. It ought to be costly to defend a righteous suit, and, where good practice obtains, it is. In California the winner pays nearly all his own costs, which is inequitable, unjust, and the fruitful cause of the terrible amount of litigation that prevails in our midst. A lawyers' fee bill should be given a place on the statute book and all the charges incurred under that should be paid by the loser to the winner in every case. It is monstrous that a man should have to resort to the Courts to recover a clearly honest claim, but it is still more monstrous that he should have not only to lose his time, but pay his law costs as well. It is only just and right that the fellow who resists the payment of honest debt should pay all the legitimate expenses incurred in collecting it. That is the almost invariable rule the wide world over; and, if it were not for the many lawyers who find their way into our Legislature it would be so here. Change the law in the direction indicated, and quickly litigation would be so decreased that we should hear no more of congested calendars, or overworked courts. Another badly needed change is one preventing lawyers bargaining for fees contingent upon the result. It would be possible to fill a volume in telling of the evils that flow from this bad legal practice. It is not tolerated in other places we know. It is contrary to public policy that a lawyer, who is an officer of the Court, should be pecuniarily interested in its decision, and it is usually made a decisive cause for disbarment. If it were made so here, there would be much less subornation to commit perjury, and very much less litigation than now disgrace our State. The Legislature has full power to effect these reforms. Two additional sections to the codes would be all that would be required. Their adoption at this session would render the present Legislature the most popular California ever had.

More About The Pacific Railroads' Debts.

It is plain that the proposition for the Government to take and operate the Pacific Railroads has not more than a Corporal's guard of supporters in Congress. Even the Californians who favor the idea, are afraid to formulate, and promulgate it. Whilst nobody favors forcible foreclosure, and Government operating is frowned upon on all sides, two new propositions hold the field, and command the support of many of the opponents of the original funding bill. It begins to be clear that Congressmen want this ticklish subject disposed of by somebody else than themselves. Hence the new proposals are (1) by the committee having charge of the matter, that a commission of three cabinet officers be given plenary power to make such settlement as to them may seem best, and (2) that by Hubbard of Missouri, calling for a non-partizan commission consisting of 15 members, to whom full powers to act, within certain not very important limitations, is given. Both commissions are to have power to compromise, sell, or otherwise dispose of the Government's claim, but in neither case is it proposed to clothe them with the power to take and operate. One or other of these measures will likely pass, and lead to a settlement more or less satisfactory. Whatever else happens, it is obvious that the demagogues from this State are not going to be listened to. The interests of a vast region, and a public debt of $125,000,000 are concerns too grave to be left to the malice of Willie Hearst and Adolph Sutro.

What Is A Fair Water Rate?

It will be an evil day for San Francisco when investments in its public utilities are deemed no longer safe, or profitable. The present raid all along the line means that, if it be successful. The Examiner coarsely tells the Supervisors that they will be branded as thieves, retired to private life, and be ruined in this community, if they dare to disobey its behests in regard to water rates. What is it which this wretchedly unscrupulous sheet demands that they shall do? It proclaims that "the current rate of interest for investments, as safe as Spring Valley stock, is from 3 to 4 per cent," and the Supervisors are required to reduce its net earnings to those figures on pain of being hounded to their ruin. A largely circulated newspaper, though not to be dreaded as it once was, is yet not without influence with the unthinking many. No doubt the Examiner, with its terribly unscrupulous ways and insensate hatred, can intimidate weak men, and even Supervisors are not all strong. The effect then of such intimidation, so far as it has any effect, must be, as we have said, to render investments in public utilities unsafe and unprofitable. Driven from every position it has heretofore taken up, the Examiner has at last been compelled to say what it wants, and if it does not get it, threatens to brand a majority of the Supervisors as thieves, etc. The Examiner is frequently consciously false as to its statements, and owes no responsibility to anybody. It finds many nickels in keeping the crowd in the excited belief that somebody is robbing them, and, by the same process, it sometimes succeeds in blackmailing corporations, as witness the Southern Pacific payment of $1,000 a month. The Supervisors, in the matter of fixing water rates, are judicial officers bound to do justice and equity between the consumers on the one hand and the water company on the other. If they fail to allow the company to earn the current rate of interest, their schedule of rates becomes worth less than the white paper it is written upon. The Courts have settled that beyond the possibility of further question. The Superior Court, with Judges Hoge, Wallace, and Shafter sitting in bank, so decided and the Supreme Court affirmed their decision. The Supervisors therefore have but a merely perfunctory duty to perform. The amount of the operating expenses and of the bonded and stock indebtedness, are well known and beyond question. The only matter that remains open is as to what constitutes a fair and reasonable rate of interest. Is the Examiner right in its contention that from 3 to 4 per cent is enough? That is the sole question now at issue. If the rate be once established so that the water company may earn no more than 3½ per cent, all the other public utilities, such as gas and street railroads, must come under the operations of the same rule. Are investors likely to put their money at that rate into enterprises of more or less risk, when they can lend it on real estate at from 6 to 8 per cent? To state the question is to answer it. Then it may be safely taken for granted that the Courts would be appealed to and that they would determine, upon the uniform testimony of business men, that not less than 6 per cent is fair and reasonable. That is inevitably what will happen if the Examiner has its way. The new rate in that case will be declared void and the existing one will be re-established. The Supervisors understand that perfectly. It remains to be seen who, and how many of them, are enough afraid of the Examiner to vote for rates they know to be illegal and certain to be set aside. In the end, the censure of thinking men will overtake them and abide long after the twaddle of daily journalism is forgotten. This harassing of capital in public uses is alarming legitimate investors, and if continued, will in the end prove destructive to the credit of San Francisco.

Hawaiian Annexation. Those who think they favor Hawaiian annexation, whether citizens of this country or residents in the islands, are just now on tiptoe in the expectation of favorable action in that behalf by the incoming administration. There is a strong belief in many quarters that the new President will present a vivid contrast to Mr. Cleveland in his attitude toward this question. To date, the oracle at Canton is dumb, and speculation upon McKinley's personal opinions would be entirely nugatory. The question, however, is an important and a living one, since there is no doubt that the policy of annexation will be urged upon the 55th Congress and supported by a considerable following in this country. Anything therefore bearing on the subject is timely. The most popular argument in favor of the scheme is that the islands are necessary, as a strategic point, to our protection against foreign powers. The United States is now 120 years of age, and has never owned a single strategic point distant from our coasts, and has never experienced the need of any. If we could thrive in safety in earlier years, why do we need them when we are strong, and the tendency is toward international arbitration? Granting that Hawaiian sentiment is ripe for annexation, and that the group would fall into our hands without firing a gun, what advantage would they be to the United States? We should at once have departed from the traditional policy of an unarmed neutrality and entered on the English path of colonization. Instead of securing a protection to our coast, increased armies, navies and fortifications would be instantly required to protect the isolated post. A large naval establishment in the islands, such as England has in Bermuda, would become a necessity. The disconnected outpost would soon demand still more distant ones to insure its safety. The Pacific is sprinkled with islands which in turn would become the object of our greed or necessities. Ambition grows on what it feeds on, and would grow until the settled policy of the nation had been left behind in the excitement of scrambling with other nations for strategic points—a policy pregnant with constant embroilment. England, the colonizer of the world, is not strong because of her colonies, but in spite of them. She was great before she owned a colony, and would be great without them. Without a colony she would have ten times the population of the Netherlands and ten times their area, a land that it is believed would be capable of supporting from twice to four times her present population without importing grain or meat. We have not lost ground for lack of colonies, neither has Russia, Germany, Austria nor Italy. England's scattered possessions are the cause of her present international timidity, and their protection an enormous expense. She avoids war knowing she is open to attack in fifty places at once unless she covers the globe with floating batteries and fortifications. Do we envy her her position? If we need Hawaii, we need Cuba, Bermuda, and the Bahamas still more. They are nearer to our Atlantic Coast than the Sandwich Islands are to our Pacific Coast, and the need of protection is vastly greater on the Eastern shore. When we had gained the points mentioned we would naturally covet the Maritime provinces of Canada and the balance of the Antilles on the same argument that each recurring one was needed to protect those already gained. The fact is that we are better off without any of them.

The Torrens Land Transfer Bill. The Torrens Land Transfer bill, now before the Legislature, has escaped defeat only by the skin of its teeth, as it were. It was supposed to be dead at one time, having been refused passage by a majority vote, but Mr. Bulla of Los Angeles moved a reconsideration, and made such a telling argument in its favor that it was given a new chance for life. It ought to live and become a law. It has worked to a charm for more than thirty years in Australia, and is peculiarly adapted to the condition of land titles in this State. There have been more disputes, litigations, and even killings in California over land troubles than it would be possible or profitable to recall at this time. Even up to this late day, land titles are not all quieted, and the practice of casting legal clouds upon men's homes is all too common still. Moreover, our system of searching records and making transcripts is becoming frightfully expensive, and an intolerable tax on real estate transactions. Under the Torrens plan, all that is done away with, and it is made as inexpensive to transfer a lot of land as an interest in a ship. The services of the legal fraternity are dispensed with, and the Recorder becomes the sole land transferer of his county. The property owner, when once on the register, may content his soul in peace, for in that case no action at law will lie against him. He has but to prove the fact that his name is the last one of record, and the case is at once demurred out of court. If by any mistake of the Recorder a man is wrongfully done out of his property, his remedy is a money payment, out of what is called "the insurance fund," amounting to nearly double the value of the land of which he has been deprived. That fund is derived from the fee paid when the record is made. It was predicted by the local lawyers at the time that the insurance fund would not nearly suffice to pay the many claims that would be brought against it. As a matter of fact, only one small claim has been preferred in more than thirty years, and the fund now amounts to about $12,000,000, all of which is safely invested in Government bonds. The fee in each case is rather less than $2, and is most cheerfully paid because of the safety and comfort it insures. These results may not be gainsaid, for they are of world-wide celebrity. Our Legislature can make no mistake in adopting a like measure.

As to Some Salaries. One of the measures now before the Legislature, which affects the taxpayers of this city, is a bill for increase of the salaries of our Police Department, and it is a measure wholly unjustifiable and without reason. It is perfectly natural that the department, which has long been recognized as a means for the payment of political and personal obligations, quite as much as a protector of the lives and property of citizens, should desire a larger percentage of the people's money, but it is equally true that in no department of San Francisco's Government has there been larger expenditures, with less satisfactory returns. It will be remembered that but a few months ago, in response to no public requirement, and against sober and intelligent public sentiment, the number of policemen was very largely increased. At that time it was pointed out that there was no occasion for the increase existing outside of the demands of the politicians and their henchmen; and so far as can be seen, the department is no more efficient to-day—its service no more satisfactory, than it was before the increase was made. Now, we have a demand for advance of salaries. Mayor Phelan very properly and succinctly voiced the truth when, at Sacramento last week, he declared that the present was no time to raise salaries; that the men employed in the department were well paid, and that the service would gain nothing in efficiency by the proposed increase. Policemen in San Francisco are well paid, and there is neither rhyme nor reason in the demand for more money in the department. As for the desire to increase the salary of Chief Crowley, $4000 per annum is sufficient. He has managed to live quite comfortably on that sum for many years, and we see no reason for increasing it just as he is about to retire to the seclusion and ease of private life on a generous pension. As to increasing the stipend of retired policemen, it is without the least warrant.

Quite a different view should be taken, however, of the proposed increase of salaries for the Judges of the Superior Court. The responsibilities of the bench, the character of ability required, and the arduous duties before the different departments, justify the demand for an increase to $6000 per annum. The work of the Superior Bench requires legal ability of a high order, and it is richly worth $500 per month. There are few lawyers, indeed, of sufficient ability to properly discharge the duties of a Superior Judge, who do not earn more money in private practice. We think six thousand dollar justice better worth the money than such as may be had on a fifty per cent. discount.

Are Car Fares Too High. Senator Braunhart's specialty this session is a cinch hill on the street car lines.

During certain hours of the morning and afternoon, when the working classes most do travel, there is to be a uniform fare, with transfer privileges, of two and a half cents. That sum, which, by the way, is an unpayable one in any money current in California, is to be good for a ride from the Ferries to the Cliff, Ingleside, and other extremities of existing lines. It does not amount in many instances to one third of one cent a mile. In the case of the majority it is about one-half of one cent a mile. We say without fear of successful contradiction that there is no street travelling done in any of the great cities of the world at those figures. It is a minimum price that outdoes anything known among civilized men. With dear coal, better wages to workmen, and the steep grades that exist over at least half the city, there is much reason why street car fares should be higher, and none why they should be lower than in other cities. Poorer working classes exist elsewhere than are to be found here. If the working men of the Mission cannot afford to pay for a ride what it is worth, and what other people pay, then it is certain that no like class in the world can. Again, why should a man who works with his hands get his car rides for less money than one who works with his head? If the legislature may so legislate, why may it not at the same time say that one class shall perforce be supplied with bread, meat, sugar, etc. at one half the price charged another class? The car ride is not in most cases, an absolute necessity, whilst the articles of diet named are. This thing of bumbing the working man into making demands inconsistent with reason, is demoralizing to him and his class, and is demagogic on the part of the cinching knives of the representatives who know that they are advocating the impossible. It is another case in which the Courts will always protect the capital invested in a public utility. It is well that they will, else we should have no car lines, gas works, water supplies, or other public conveniences. Senator Braunhart and the class he affects to represent may be mighty, but not so mighty as the United States Constitution as it now reads. If Bryan, Altgeld, Tillman and their friends be given the opportunity to rewrite it, things may be different.

The Governor's Veto. Governor Budd has refused to sanction the proposed appropriation of $75,000, to make good the deficiency existing in the State Printing Office, and the public in general will commend his course. The message accompanying his veto of the appropriation is full of excellent reasons for his action. From the figures therein presented, it is apparent that the State Printing Office is conducted in a scandalous and recklessly extravagant manner, and that, as the Governor suggests, a great saving would be effected if the work were let out to the highest bidder. To literally abolish the State Printing Office would be justified upon every ground of economy. The Governor shows that in some instances the charge for work performed at the State office is more than twice as much as the same service would cost elsewhere. He shows from the records furnished by Mr. Johnson, the State Printer, that in a single department—the press rooms—there is an approximate waste of $800 per week. The printing office carries ninety girls here, and the work turned out by them can be done by seventeen. What the seventy-three remaining in that department do to earn $11 per week, or any other sum, is not known. The same is equally true in the bindery—in fact, no department is free from mismanagement, incompetence, not to say downright fraud. The Governor has vainly called for information, explanation, and detailed statements from the State office, but has not been able to obtain a lucid or satisfactory response. In view of these facts—the criminal waste, utter indifference, and incompetent management glaringly apparent in every department, the demand for an additional $75,000 to encourage further extravagance and corruption, is an amazing exhibition of unmixed gall, and richly deserves the rebuke it received. Whatever may be the fate of this bill—whether it be passed over the Governor's head or die where it lies, the Chief Executive has performed his duty in exerting his prerogative to defeat it, and has performed a public service in letting the light in upon the disgraceful methods of doing business in the State Printing Office.

The Loud Postal Bill. The Loud postal bill, which bids fair to become a law, is not what its enemies are representing it to be. It does not strike at legitimate newspapers, daily or weekly, but it denies to flash literature in serial form, to purely advertising sheets, and to organs of patent medicine and other business concerns, the use of the mails at the cheap second-class rate. That rate was established to encourage the circulation of newspapers and periodical literature, on the theory that the Government may well assist in promoting the popular enlightenment. That no such benefit accrues from the circulation of patent medicine advertising and flash fictional reprints, goes without saying. The argument on which the opponents of the Loud bill appear to rest their case is that its passage would greatly curtail the use of white paper. This amounts to the preposterous position that the Government should carry free all matter that comes to hand, in order to encourage labor in the paper mills. Verily, this is protection run mad. The postal expenditure now exceeds the revenue by about $10,000,000 per annum. It is intimated by the experts that the dropping out of this unworthy second-class matter would about square the accounts. The increase of this kind of mail matter has been no less than 50,000,000 pounds within the past two years, and the end is not yet. It is the simple purpose of the Loud bill to restore the second-class concessions of the mail service to the original intention, and by so doing to destroy the postal deficit, and render the service almost self-supporting. It is an eminently reasonable proposal, and ought to become law.

The Ministers' Rage. Some one has somewhere said that there are three kinds of people—men, women, and ministers. We are forcibly reminded of this saying by the attitude almost without exception, of the cloth of the city toward Dr. David Starr Jordan. That distinguished gentleman had the amusing misfortune to say in a recent lecture that certain phases of so-called religious excitement were in no wise different from intoxication. Whereat the brethren arose as one man, and fell upon Stanford's President with indescribable fury. Their shriekings savored of all things, excepting common sense and reason. They mistake violent personal attacks and intemperate assertions for argument; and by their immediate departure from a calm and dispassionate consideration of the position taken by Dr. Jordan, demonstrate their inability to discuss with dignity and intelligence the statements he has made. Their hot anger is in marked contrast to the soft answer that turneth away wrath, and is an amazing spectacle of had judgment and intolerance, where we should look for clearness, candor, and reason. The cause of religion gains nothing by such an exhibition as the ministers have given us. And their outburst presents to the thoughtful layman a very pronounced reason for the small attendance of men upon their churches, and lagging zeal within the walls of Zion. The clergy should broaden out until they can oppose argument with argument. When they can control themselves, only, can they be respected. Their swelling chorus of vituperation, drizzled through newspaper columns and thundered from pulpits, overturns no opposing opinion; it weakens their influence, and brings their chosen faith into doubt and contempt. Meantime, it is noted that an estimable young lady of Santa Cruz has gone insane, because of the religious emotions condemned by Dr. Jordan.

Our Navy's Weakness. The fortunate and unexpected escape of the North Atlantic squadron from the roaring ocean, emphasizes the fear everywhere expressed that the new navy is lacking in those seagoing qualities without which ships are valueless. The reports of the behavior of the war vessels in the recent storm, which was not particularly severe, awaken the gravest doubt of their ability to stay on top of the water. Not only is it apparent that the new navy is primarily far less safe than the merchant marine; but our warships become unsoldered and spring leaks in unexpected and dangerous places; their turrets get out of order, their guns break loose and charge down the decks, until the perils that threaten aboard are little less to be feared than the engulfing waters without. We are paying out millions to build up a navy that shall protect the American flag on every sea, and maintain the dignity of the United States among the nations of the earth; and it begins to look as if we were not getting our money's worth. Our vessels should first be able to withstand the assaults of the elements before they can safely oppose the hore and hatteries of other powers.

That Costly New York Ball. The giving of a private hall, or entertainment, is entirely within the right of the individual who gives it, and to question that right is to impinge upon personal liberty and to perpetrate a very gross impertinence. That a few ministers have used their pulpits as a point of advantage from which to denounce the givers of the Bradley-Martin hall, because of its costliness, goes to prove that Christ yet has followers only fitted to mend nets and catch fish. That such bad form in matter and manners should exist at this advanced stage of civilization and refinement, says little for either the education, or good manners, of the offending preachers. It may be true that $290,000 is a large sum to pay for a single entertainment, but whose business is that? And who holds a gauge with which to measure its proportionate largeness? To multi-millionaires it may be a comparative trifle, whereas to that large section of would-be-somebodies who live beyond their means, the giving of any ball at all is often a pleasure they must needs forego. If the entertainers are rich, and accumulating more than they can spend for their personal wants, they are benefactors when they let loose their purse strings, and permit the unused surplus to go flowing out among their neighbors. It is said that they should use it only for the benefit of the poor. That is a matter for the owners of the purse to decide, and for nobody else to dictate. Besides, opinions differ as to how best to cause money to reach the poor. Many good and thoughtful people believe that giving something for nothing does nobody, except, perhaps, the sick and helpless, any good, and that the best way to reach the humble folks of a neighborhood is to put orders around among its trades-people who are employers. We talk of the evils of the rich growing richer, and the poor poorer, and in the same breath cry out against the equalizing process instituted by the Bradley-Martins. Bah!

Evolution of the Secretary. The evolution of the secretary to the President of the United States has been rapid. When Cleveland went to the White House, he raised the office from a par with the ushers and clerks, to a position of consequence. Then Lamont became his adviser and the receiver and entertainer of Senators and other State dignitaries. Harrison brought Halford from the Indianapolis Journal to his aid, and Cleveland's secretary, Thurber, has expanded the social side of the position. The secretary to the President has become a person of much importance, and it is now said that Mr. McKinley's secretary will maintain a separate establishment and take a prominent part in the social life of the new administration. He will play the part of a diplomat; elevated to the level of cabinet officers and other important persons, his influence in the President's family politically, and in Washington life socially, will demonstrate a remarkable evolution from the position of stenographer and clerk to that of confidential adviser to the President and prominent factor in the inner circle at the national capital.

IN Chicago the Aldermen have very charitably consented to divide the proceeds of a street railroad franchise with the city. This is a surprising exhibition of Aldermanic generosity, and should be immediately brought to the attention of San Francisco's Board of thrifty Supervisors.

THE fact that Admiral Bunce's squadron rode out the recent gales on the Atlantic, demolished the theory that the new navy was amphibious.

'We obey no wand but pleasure's.'—Tom Moore.

FOR a short time Americans in general, and Californians in particular, felt more than passing pride for Ned Townsend. We looked upon him as a sort of Kipling of the Bowery who was going to purify the teumets, reform Richard Harding Davis and highly specialize a phase of North American literature. There were even hopes that some day he might be caricatured and satirized—hopes suddenly and disappointingly realized when Townsend took up the Fadden stories again and performed these services for himself. Townsend always has had what is known reportorially as a rare nose for news, and to-day that means a nose which will stand almost anything—even the body-snatching of defunct fads. And the Chimmie fad is so dead that I wonder a special decomposing room has not been fitted out in The Journal building for the linotype which sets the Townsend copy.

I went to the Columbia, in truth, because I was paid to go. I took no enthusiasm with me and expected to find less on the stage. I thought the players would be as fatigued of their parts as I am of the sketches which inspired them. I came away in somebody's debt for an evening of easy, unexact entertainment, and I think my gratitude may be safely divided between the actors and Mr. Gus Thomas, who together have done as much for Townsend as he has done against himself. Thomas cut off the perennial Fadden in the bud of his pre-nuptials, Nat Goodwinized the sorrow and small bottled solace of Mr. Paul, and gave Mrs. Bates the material for an Irishwoman who, for life-likeness and stage art will compare with Annie Yeamans' in the palmy days of Harrigan. There is much in the construction, the quiet play of sentiment and the snug orchestration of the various parts which shows the distinctive touch of a graceful dramatist.

This is not to be construed as an unqualified eulogy of Chimmie Fadden, for the play lacks much from both the technical and human standpoint. The burglarizing episode is treated with banal melodramatics—all that goose flesh pizzacatti from the orchestra, that sepulchral thunder from the throats of the thieves, and the I-am-Little-Dick-the-Avenger speech from Chimmie. The detective's investigation is over-elaborated on decayed farce lines, and the uniqueness of Chimmie's alibi (a signal song sung in the night) would be better appreciated and the play brought to a more enthusiastic close were there less delay in the denouement. Five minutes of bad drag could be cut from the last part of the last act. Besides, all the rights of anti-climax belong to Mr. Townsend in New York. Chimmie is not to be held up as a model for aspiring American dramatists withal it has many neat virtues, and the second act opens with real atmosphere—that indefinable individualizing of place and people that of all our playwrights Thomas alone seems able to make the actor and the audience feel. What I urge, is that the play is clever enough to compel interest in characters who are dead in the hooks and mouldy in the newspapers.

Unlike Mr. Brodie, Mr. Hopper is not to the Bowery born. He is a millionaire, I am told; his father is the same twenty times over, and the down-turned palm and the expectorant wot 'ell are purely matters of cultivation. In an age when most millionaires are devoting their energies to becoming paupers through the medium of a yacht, or a harem or a newspaper, Hopper's position as the hardest working man in his company cannot but do him credit in more ways than one. There is no denying that he has reduced Chimmie to a fine point—in the acting, I mean; physically Chimmie is of most unstinted latitude. You may go to the Columbia with your own opinions about slim Chimmies, but an act of Hopper's abominous geniality, and you wonder how he ever could have been long and lean, and worn anybody's old clothes who did not measure a good fifty-three around the appetite. And his voice is of that peculiar, popular quality, unfinished, yet so agreeably intimate that it disarms serious criticism—a voice, I have noticed, that by some odd whim of fortune almost inevitably belongs to the comedian who sings the songs of his own composing.

With the exceptions of Sydney Price, who seems indeterminate as to whether "His Whiskers" is a Fourteenth-street floor-walker or a female impersonator, and Miss Bernice Wheeler, who is too true to Laura Jean Libbey's real aristocracy to ever palm off for a cheap stage imitation, I can recall no inadequacy in the cast. Thomas and Townsend conspired to make Mr. Paul a Nat Goodwin part, and many of George Nash's mannerisms—most notably the drawl in his speech and the drawl in his legs—make comparisons inevitable. And when a man reminds you of Nat Goodwin—as Nash certainly does—and it affects you pleasantly—as it does me—and you regard Goodwin as the best actor in America—as all of us must who are awake—well, then I say Nash has received a very pretty compliment. What do you think?

We all prate more or less realism, for the plays, but there are times when we do not live up to it. For instance, we prefer an imitation Boweryite by Hopper to the real thing by Brodie. Grace Parlotta's French maid in A Gaiety Girl entertained me more than any similar character I have ever seen—and when you come to a cold analysis of Miss Parlotta, she was Viennese pure and simple. The Duchess, as Miss Beth Franklyn plays her, is another example: she is unmistakably American—her accent is too good to be true, her alert gesticular Frenchisms are too Frenchy to be real, and her gowns are too surely poised to ever have belonged to any one else. Still she has a charm, a delicate fragrance, which you will not find in your French maid at home. Miss Franklyn plays the maid out of her own personality, she substitutes imagination for nature, and she acts from her agile eyebrows down to the tips of her sleek patent leathers. "Fools follow rules, wise men precede them"—sometimes there are wise women, too. Miss Franklyn finds a new way of being French; moreover, she finds a hurst of real, spontaneous acting in the last act.

Marie Bates was a success before the curtain went up Monday night, and she was a success when it went down. She was acknowledged before she was seen, and she was conceded all her reputation's worth throughout the performance. From the musicians in the orchestra to the critics in the foyer, it was "Bates!" What an electrification her first performance must have been to the authors! There is little in the writing of the part that anticipates the bigger half of all the character acting in the play. And there is something beyond mere acting in this work. Mrs. Murphy is not a central character in either the story or action of Chimmie Fadden—she is just a droll old Irishwoman, worn, soiled and beery, who drops in on the scenes apropos of nothing in particular, and rivets your every attention so long as she is on the stage. Her's is the true comedy art, and it magnetizes you. People will go once to see Chimmie Fadden, and twice to see Mrs. Bates.

From the Bowery to the Arena is but the breadth of a street. At the Baldwin, Louis James and his company are competing in Dr. Bird's famous lung-contest Spartacus. Despite the encomiums of New Orleans and other art centers, it cannot be said in truth that James finds his life work in this turbulent tragedy. Dr. Bird's Romanizing may have found glory in San Francisco in the pre-sandlot days, but a softer generation asks for softer things. Dr. Bird, like most men who shout at the top of their voices, has very little to say, and he says that little long. I admire Mr. James's appearance as the Thracian warrior, and I admire the brute higness, both vocal and physical, which he gives to the arena scene. The rest of his work I deplore. It releases all the meaningless rant which I thought the years had taught him to subdue. Guy Lindsley, under any circumstances a had actor, even surpasses his worst previous record in the part of Pharsarius. The bogns ravings of John McCullough thundered from a ten mule-power phonograph would be a mere cannon's roar compared with Lindsley's pectoriloquial frenzy. James has invested a great deal of good scenery in Spartacus—enough in fact to have a better play fitted to it. The only chance of urban recognition I see for Spartacus lies in London where they take several years of Wilson Barrett's Neronian nightmare, The Sign of the Cross.

The picture is not supposed to count for much in concert singing—dowdy women and awkward men have made appearances a negative qualification. Yet, when Antoinette Trebelli (of whom, in a vague way we have heard very much and known very little beyond the facts that she is the daughter of her mother, and that she achieved some distinction in South Africa and Australia), walked down the California stage Tuesday night to where the footlights should have been lighted, and even in the dim we saw that she was young, handsome, unpowdered and unrouged, and above all, unostentatious—then, I think, appearances counted for a great deal. Trebelli is something new. The Nemiramide "Bel Raggio" is not, and Trebelli needed all this charin of newness and freshness to tide her over a conservative singing of music that means little unless fired by the flame of the singer. Eliminate the "Bel Raggio" and her triumph was easy and complete. Trebelli's voice may not be dramatic, but it is plastic, languorous, caressing, of an utmost lyric sweetness, sensitive, delicious, and warm, with a rich sweep of effortless tone. The dramatic instinct is much a matter of cultivation, and with Trebelli, I think, it is merely a matter of more cultivation. She is young and imaginative, her method is pure and direct, and nature has given her the voice—il bel canto! She has, moreover, a fine taste. She sang Auber's Laughing song with real laughter in her voice, and responded as truthfully to the melancholy of Solveig's song from Grieg's Peer Gynt music, and met Bishop's old test song, "Lo! Here the Gentle Lark," with the flawless technique it demands.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Madlin is enjoying a bouctous prosperity at the Tivoli. Several new features are introduced with good effect, and the public's patronage bears out last week's statement that it is the best extravaganza ever staged at the Tivoli.

In addition to the dancing Gleasons and the acrobatic Ara, Zehra and Vara—who have been well received this week—the Orpheum offers no less than four new acts for the new bill: Edmuud Hayes and Emily Lytton in their twenty-minute play, A French Marriage, a grand opera quartette, which includes Guille, the teuror, Abramoff, the basso, Julia Cotte, soprano, and Miss Dora Busch, contralto; the Fiuneys, who swim in a tank, and the Renfos, who fly through the air.

Let all who were disappointed in Spartacus take heart. Louis James will play Hamlet Thursday and Othello Wednesday and Sunday. We know both of these for excellent portrayals. On Monday, Tuesday and Friday evenings, and at the matinee, James will give us comedy—a new comedy, too, My Lord and Some Ladies, from the French of Scribe. The comedy deals with good Queen Anne, Bolingbroke, Mrs. Jobn Churchill, and many famous characters contemporaneous with the birth of the house of Marlborough.

At next Thursday's symphony concert at the Columbia, Mr. Marquardt will be concertmaster in place of Mr. Beel, who leaves for Europe on Monday. Mr. Marquardt has already given us evidence of his ability for the post, and if he cannot entirely reconcile us to Mr. Beel's absence, it is not that we love Marquardt less, but that we love Beel more. And with good reason—Beel has done more for good music in San Francisco than any man of his day. Thursday's programme embraces Goldmark's Sakuntala overture, Beethoven's Second Symphony (the D Major,) Krug's "Love Stories," (a suite for strings and harp), and a Spanish rhapsodie by Chabrier. The last two numbers are novelties; the symphony has been played here but once before.

The children have the California Theatre next week—the clever children who make up "Our Little Cinderella Company," and play out the fairy tale in new spectacular dress. Rosina D'Ennery makes her first professional how in the title role, Little Gus Levick is somewhere in the story, together with Jimmy Horn, Gus Tait, Nina Cook, Alice Condon, and the Sawyer children; and Daisy Grogan is cast for the fairy Godmother, who gives away glass slippers and pumpkin coaches to good little girls who are not envious of haughty sisters.

Chimmie Fadden will bring crowds to the Columbia for another week, after which Fanny Rice.

THE ART EPICUREAN.

(THIRD PAPER.)

"All human history attests
That happiness for man,—the hungry sinner,— Since Eve ate apples, much depends on dinner."

WHAT is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; but never in cook book or club cuisine was found a duck sauce equal—nay, approaching—unto that evolved by the brain of one of our brightest legal luminaries, Colonel H. I. Kowalsky.

It is certainly mal apropos to confront an invalid with a request for an interview on topics culinary, when the interviewee is limited to a mushy, gruelly diet especially invented by his satanic majesty to torment the keenly sensitive palate of the epicure, but the Colonel, with his never-failing courtesy, gave the desired information, and left the scribe his debtor forever.

The magic rites begin by taking one and one-half ounces of lime juice; adding to it one-half an ounce of Worcestershire sauce and a pretty strong seasoning of salt, pepper and red pepper—don't forget that last; in fact, don't forget the fraction of a grain of any ingredient in this, or your cake is all dough. Add ten drops of tahasco and a half-teaspoonful of paprica. Make this all up into a mélange, stirring and mixing thoroughly. Then put four ounces of butter into a pan, melt it and stir a little—only a little—flour into it to slightly thicken it. Then add the aforementioned ingredients, ready prepared, and keep covered, for it must be served hot. Stir the whole well together, take it off the fire, murmur an incantation, and take my word for it (at second hand) that a duck smothered in such a dressing is glad that it fell a victim to the deadly shot-gun—or the marketer's pocketbook. When you want to bring out the hidden possibilities of the canvasback which you, Ananias-like wretch that you are, "brought down over on the marsh," just decorate it with the order of Kowalsky, and leave the rest to your appreciative palate—and your conscience.

From duck sauce to salad is a far cry, but the gay and gallant hunter (for dainty tid-hits) doesn't mind that; so, speaking of hunters brings to mind, naturally, a club hunt, and a club hunt without Frank Carolan would be like salad without salt, and there you are. Salad comes right along in proper sequence, and it is Mr. Carolan's salad that takes the blue ribbon for novelty. The foundation for this tower of skill is young, tender lettuce leaves, and the other indispensable is alligator pears. These latter come from the Islands or from Mexico, and why they are called pears passes my comprehension, for their only resemblance lies in their shape. They have a large pit instead of a core, and are used in this salad in their freshly ripened state, being divided and scraped from the skin. A simple French dressing completes this salad, which carries a sort of indescribable zest, and would easily make one gush over the next course even if the latter were not a brilliant success of itself.

To preface a little theatre supper with this salad and then have a delicate chafing-dish course, would about paint the poster, and so, delving in the caverns of memory, Mr. Ed. Greenway's favorite dish comes nobly to time. Browned oysters—doesn't that sound succulent? Well, the whole charm of the delicacy is to have it succulent, and this is the way Mr. Greenway would begin operations toward a successful finale:

Two chafing dishes are required. And here, in parenthesis, let me impress upon you the advisability of having a metal tray under the chafing dish, for, should there be alcohol on the outside of the lamp, there is possibility of its taking fire and communicating with the napery of the table, and being the means of great damage. The term chafing dish is applied both to the one and two-dish article, but rightly belongs only to the latter, the former being a blazer, the chafing dish being supplied with a second pan below the first to contain the hot water, and acting on the principle of the double boiler. But to return to our browned oysters. Select the largest, juiciest hivalves that you can persuade your purveyor to part with. Put them into a chafing dish and let them simmer and bubble. Watch closely and at the instant they stop running, transfer them to the other receptacle ready prepared with enough butter so that they will not be reluctant to part company with it. When the juice stops coming they are ready to serve. For large parties one could utilize bread pans and the range oven, but we will not enter into that, since it is only a very small theatre party that we are catering to this time. Baltimore oyster crabs would be delicious cooked in any of the scores of different ways made possible by the aid of the chafing dish. An indispensable adjunct to the browned oysters is some relish like celery or salad. If there is not time for the salad, a nip from a young, blanched celery stalk would be a good substitute, although the California celery has never been grown that can hold a candle to the Kalamazoo celery. It needs the severe frost to crown its tender young life, and that California's "glorious climate" refuses to supply. Why Kalamazoo, don't ask me; it is probably a legendary idea handed down from generation to generation, a sort of companion piece to the asseveration that no potatoes on earth can be grown to equal those about Salt Lake.

In my fevered frenzy for information on the subject of high-living, I injudiciously accosted a member of the Press Club. In answer to my meek query as to his favorite dish, and scarcely stopping in his mad rush, he shouted, "Coffee and sinkers!" as if he were ordering those delectable morsels at a Third-street chop house; then, without heeding my look of horror, he nimbly doubled around a Mission street car and was lost to sight in the six o'clock crowd. Probably it is one of the requirements of that mysterious club, into which no feminine eye should pry, (though one woman's curiosity recently got the better of her wisdom—if she ever had any), that the literary mind is best nourished by the lowly fare above mentioned. But that would bring out pros and cons for which we have not time. It only serves to remind me of a little talk I had with Attorney Geo. A. Knight the other day.

When confronted with the all-important question, he smiled indulgently—he has all sorts of freaks to deal with in his profession—"What is my favorite dish, and how prepared?" he said. "Well, you know, a man can't answer anything so important off-hand," (just as if a lawyer ever did answer a question without fencing), "but I think I can say confidently and confidentially that when I have time to think of eating"—in the pauses of the Coon(ey) hunt at present engaging his attention, I suppose he means—"a yearning for doughnuts and coffee 'comes o'er me, that my soul cannot resist." And then he went on to relate how, when he sees a chance for a day of rest, he wires his dear old mother at her home in Eureka, that she may be prepared for a descent upon her—and incidentally her pantry—then that night he takes the Pomona for the scenes of his youth, arriving early next morning to find the fatted calf ready and waiting in the shape of a huge pan of "mother's" doughnuts, made under her careful supervision, and accompanied by steaming Mocha, perfected by unlimited Jersey cream ordered post haste from the family milkman when the steamer is sighted crossing the bar. In this sweet elysium of delight, notarial tangles and unwilling wills are lost to sight, and George A. basks to his hasket's repletion, returning cityward to wisely consign himself to the tender mercies of his family physician for a fortnight or so.

MOËT AND CHANDON CHOSEN.

The Only Champagne Used At The Bradley-Martin Ball.

At the Bradley-Martin (Gress) hall, surpassing anything of the kind before attempted in this country, the cost of which was not less than $300,000, competition among the champagne importers was so strong that it was decided to submit to the most noted epicures of the four hundred unmarked samples of all the leading champagnes, and thus it came about that those who, by their taste and experience, are the qualified judges of that which is best, selected the brand of Moët & Chandon, which was the only champagne served at this event.—New York despatch.

It used to be the rule for the women of society to rail against the men who accepted every invitation and never gave any sort of return, not even a posy or a book. But this year has been prolific of social courtesies extended by the beaux of the swim to their lady friends; and not a week goes by without theatre parties, luncheons, dinners, and suppers, with well-known men as hosts. The girls say that to Mr. Wiltsee, the Eastern South African, belongs the credit of inaugurating the fashion of sending flowers and bon-bons to them, a fashion so prevalent in the larger Eastern cities.

The numerous friends and acquaintances of the Younger family will be glad to know that the youngest daughter, Miss Alice, is rapidly recovering from her severe illness, thus enabling her step-mother to leave for her new home in Chicago shortly. Musical circles will regret the departure of so talented a pianist as Mrs. Younger, who in her line is as talented as the genial doctor is in his, and many hopes are expressed that the Chicago home will be but a temporary one after all, and San Francisco be again their dwelling place.

San Rafael seems destined to be the place for fashion to select as the summer abode, and Mine Host Warfield is daily filling his list of applications for rooms at the favorite hotel he presides over; added to which the numerous house owners in the vicinity have announced their intention of taking up residence in the little burgh for the summer. The Louis Parrotts will, their friends say, entertain a good deal in a rural way, and if Mrs. de Young spends the season at Meadowlands, she will add not a little to the brilliancy of the fashionable set in the Valley.

It has been suggested by some one that the members of our society and community, wives and daughters, of British descent, should organize as an auxiliary to Consul Warburton's committee of fifty to aid the Diamond Jubilee project. Surely, with the abundant material to be found here, the idea is a good one. Mrs. Foreman, Mrs. Henry Scott, and Miss Warburton are energetic in their ways, and should be able to effect a splendid entertainment, while there are scores of others to follow in their lead.

Apparently we are not to have another Goad wedding, for a time at least, the fair Aileen having departed Eastward with her father and sister Genevive; so no doubt Charley will warble by the light of the moon, "all to his self," on his Sausalito veranda till his prospective bride's return.

Report goes that one of the Ross Valley belles will have a midsummer wedding; Baron von Schroeder is said to have promised the girls lots of riding parties, paper chases, hunts, etc., so B'lingham will have to work hard in the face of all these attractions to keep its end up.

The traditional little bird that hovers round the charmed circle of the Four Hundred, is twittering with the news that the second Miss Carroll is also to shuffle off the single coil. Society can guess who the happy man will be, says the twitter, with a sound like Peru.

Friends on this coast of Miss Anna Ruger, the popular daughter of our late commanding General, hear that upon her father's retirement in April next she will accompany her parents to Europe for a two years' sojourn.

On dit, that Wiltsee's young New York friend "Thomas" is making himself very popular in society drawing rooms. Bon-bons and flowers are a sure means to that end in feminine quarters.

Rumor has it that Mrs. Will Crocker is considering a novel entertainment, to be given at her B'lingham Villa during the Eastertide. The subject is a profound secret, and the details will not be given to the public until the whole is an accomplished fact.

"Another army chap engaged," is what the buds are saying, but as yet no announcement is made, and as the young Lieutenant in question has been equally devoted to two girls, rumor hesitates to say which is the chosen one.

On dit, the brunette sister of a recent bride is likely to appear in a bridal robe herself ere long. Although only a debutante, the conquest has been rapid and much commented upon at teas and club dances.

An on dit of interest to the swim goes that Miss Florence Breckenridge will return to Europe with her mother, Mrs. Fred Sharon, upon the termination of the Sharons' visit here in the spring.

the Week.*

Mr. Somerset, who is a son of the well-known Lady Henry Somerset, and who was one of Richard Harding Davis's companions in his tour through Venezuela and Central America, has probably accomplished a greater amount of hard and rough travel than any other man of his youthful years in the world. His book entitled "The Land of the Muskeg" is a narrative of a trip through unexplored regions of North western Canada, from Edmonton in Alberta, where the railroad ends, across the Rocky Mountains, to Quesnel Mouth on the Fraser River. But what is a "muskeg?" you ask. Well, it is an area covered with soft, vividly green, treacherously yielding moss, terribly wearisome and exhausting to traverse, wet and dreary to camp in. Like all adventurous young men in a wild country, Somerset and his companions hoped to shoot elk, bear, and other large game, but they found hunting in such regions difficult and well-nigh impossible, and suffered serious privations from scarcity of food, besides meeting with other mishaps. They killed and ate heavers, marmots, and a few ptarmigan, but were entirely unsuccessful in their efforts to hag deer or grizzlies. At last they were reduced to such straits that they had to kill one of the least useful of their pack horses, and on this animal's flesh they eked out a bare and unenjoyed subsistence until they reached Fort McLeod, where they rested and made preparations for a fresh start. The latter part of their journey was accomplished with less discomfort and suffering than the former, and eventually they made their way to British Columbia and tasted afresh the sweets of civilization. Mr. Somerset writes in a simple, pleasant, unaffected style, telling of many strange and amusing characters that he encountered. One of the most remarkable of these was John Gough Brick, the Anglican missionary in Fort St. John—a man with an extraordinary supply of blue stories and an utter ignorance of the language of the Indians, to whose spiritual wants he is supposed to minister. We feel, after reading the book, that a wholesome love of rough life and dangerous adventure must yet be as strong as ever it was among the gentlemen of England when a young man, scarcely twenty years of age, the grandson of a duke, with all the pleasures of society and the great cities of the world open to him, chooses to journey for weeks with a packtrain through unknown wilds, eating the coarsest food, and submitting to the hardest labor and even to quite serious danger. So long as there shall be a plentiful supply of young men of this type, no one need concern himself about the early Decline and Fall of the British Empire. These are the men who, if they lose one empire, will gain another. The illustrations from photographs are not particularly good as pictures, but serve to give some idea of the country traversed, and the maps enable the reader to follow clearly the course pursued by the party. The book has an introduction by Mr. Somerset's traveling companion, Mr. A. H. Pollen.

*"The Land of the Muskeg." By H. Somerset, with a preface by A. Hungerford Pollen. With a hundred and ten illustrations from sketches by A. H. Pollen and instantaneous photographs, and four maps. London. William Heinemann. 1895.

The February issue of Self Culture, published by the Werner Company, contains a large number of articles of information on very various topics, such as Wages in the United States, Japanese Characteristics, Herbert Spencer's Philosophy, the Cuban Insurrection, and the new Congressional Library. It is edited by Mr. G. Mercer Adam, who is said to have assisted Professor Goldwin Smith in founding the Canadian Monthly. Personally, we are not great believers in any of these attempts to cover the whole field of knowledge, and we think that people of cultivation are for the most part extremely shy of them. The foolish desire to be encyclopædic is most commonly felt by people who have received little early training and have no conception of the time, labor, and pains that are necessary to gain even a fair acquaintance with the literature of one language or the facts of a single branch of science. The magazine, however, contains its own antidote, if people will but take it: for it quotes a sentence of Dean Stanley, to this effect: "Insist on reading the great books, on marking the great events of the world. Then the little hooks can take care of themselves, and the trivial incidents of passing politics and diplomacy may perish with the using." By a strange irony of fate, this sentence, probably the most pregnant and valuable thing in the whole issue, is printed in small type, and crowded in at the bottom of a page, to fill up a space left vacant by an article on "Reading Aloud" contributed by some elocutionist. But, for all this, we are ready to admit that the periodical is a veritable storehouse of cold facts, and for people who want this kind of thing, is just the kind of thing they want.

Mr. E. L. Godkin has a most suggestive article in the February Atlantic Monthly, in which he shows that modern democracies disregard special fitness for the performance of special work, and are unwilling to acknowledge that there can be anything special about any man. Of course, the grotesque idea that all men are equal is responsible for these notions, which are further strengthened by the circumstance that modern democracies, by discouraging distinction, tend to bring about that dead level which is their ideal. That in public affairs one man is as good as another, and equally fit for any post, and that public functions, such as patrolling the streets, extinguishing fires, delivering letters, and keeping City Hall corridors dirty, should be performed by men of particular shades of misinformation about public affairs, and particular kinds of ignorance about social and political economy, instead of by men competent to perform them, are only logical deductions from these fatally erroneous premises. The result is, that the number of men of distinction and real competence in public affairs steadily diminishes, so that there is good reason to believe that the happy day when one man shall be as unfit as another, and when all men shall be equally inconspicuous and undistinguished, is already within measurable distance.

Without any idea of supporting Mr. Godkin's views, Mr. Andrew Lang has recently been pointing out that there are from the earliest ages prodigious differences, insurmountable and unalterable, in the natural capacities of children. To prove this, it is necessary only to point to the marvelous musical capacity exhibited by very young children before they have received the slightest training, and to the hardly less remarkable and conspicuous talent for mathematics apparent in some boys and entirely absent in others of much greater and more versatile intelligence. The almost diabolical dexterity in all things mathematical possessed by some men of very moderate intelligence, and the utter density of some able men in the same matters, are striking facts.

The Bookman has lately announced that it will not return rejected manuscripts to writers, even though postage stamps for that purpose are enclosed with the contribution. May we ask what The Bookman does with the stamps? Does it make the writer lose them as a kind of forfeit for having omitted to read or neglected to conform to their rule, and convert them to its own uses? To appropriate another man's property entrusted to you for a particular and entirely reasonable purpose, seems to us quite indefensible. In fact, we have always thought that, even in case of acceptance of a manuscript, the stamps sent to ensure its return in the event of non-acceptance should be sent back to the writer. But writers are so glad to have their wares purchased that they wink at the petty larceny which often accompanies acceptance.

A tiny little magazine with pages of $5\frac{1}{2}$ by $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches is issued by J. H. Lyons & Co. of Boston, under the title of The Postage Stamp. Its annual subscription is as small as its pages—twenty cents. As its name implies, it furnishes news and facts of interest to "philatelists," as collectors of stamps are (we know not for what reason) called. From a recent issue we learn that the Premier of Nova Scotia, acting on behalf of the Government of that colony, recently sold to a firm of dealers a large number of Nova Scotian stamps, guaranteed to be "remainders." We suppose a "remainder" to be a stamp actually printed for use, and not for sale to collectors.

SOME NOTABLE FANCY DRESS BALLS.

FANCY dress balls appear to be the topic of the hour, and many tongues, both at home and abroad, have been wagging for weeks past over the Bradley-Martins', the magnificence of which was to eclipse anything of the kind ever yet attempted in modern times. The bal costumes of Mrs. Astor and Mrs. Vanderbilt are cited as instances of what money can do in getting up such an entertainment, and the Bradley-Martins have exceeded them both in that respect. While these are all spoken of as being something quite out of the common, there is still another bal costume that is surely worthy of remembrance as having been the most perfect one of its kind; in fact, the first given on a scale of magnificence hitherto unknown in the United States, and that is the ball given by the wife of our California Senator, Dr. William M. Gwin, in Washington City, in April 1858. And there are still many, both here and in Washington, who can recall the sensation it created—little less, if any, than that of the Bradley-Martins, and the never-ending theme it was for many a year after. Mrs. Gwin, as wife of the Senator from California, was a fitting representative of the Golden State. Her entertainments were all on a scale of lavish expenditure, and the service of gold plate used at her formal dinners had then never seen its equal. At the ball in question, Mrs. Gwin appeared in a magnificent costume as a Marquise of the Court of Louis XVI; Miss Gwin (Mrs. E. J. Coleman) was a Greek girl, and Miss Carrie Gwin a Court Page. Among the most noted characters were those of Lady Napier, who wore a costume of the Seventeenth Century; Mrs. Jeff Davis, as Madame de Stael; Mrs. Senator Douglas as Aurora; Mrs. Dan Sickles as Little Red Riding Hood, and Mrs. Roderick Cameron, who was magnificent as the Duchess of Comas; Mr. Cameron (now Sir Roderick), wore the full costume of a Highland Chief. The Turkish Admiral, officers of our army and navy, Lord Napier, and many of the foreign diplomatic corps, wore their uniforms. Sir W. Gore Ouseley donned his robes as Knight Commander of the Bath. Lady Ouseley appeared as a French Marquise; the wife of the Russian Minister, Madame Stoekel, as the Duchess de Nemours. President Buchanan and his Cabinet officers were among the guests, but were allowed the privilege of appearing in citizens' evening dress.

Fancy dress balls are always the most expensive entertainments given, not alone to the host or hostess, as the case may be, but to the guests in the matter of costume, and therefore are they of such rare occurrence. But for all that, they are not quite unknown in our own city of San Francisco. The most notable, as being the first attempted, was of semi-public character, having been given by a committee of gentlemen at the Cosmopolitan Hotel on Bush street, in December, 1864. All society was represented. Many of the costumes were very handsome, and the ball was a huge success. Among the most admired characters were those of Mrs. Frank Pixley, as a French Marquise; Mrs. Hall McAllister, as Queen of Spades; Mrs. R. J. Vandewater, as Madame de Pompadour; Mrs. Homans, as an Italian Peasant; Mrs. Cutler McAllister, as Marie Antoinette; Mrs. Senator Steuart, as Rebecca; and Mrs. Schmiedell as a Bride.

Two other bal costumes of note were those of Mrs. Hall McAllister and Mrs. W. H. Howard. Mrs. McAllister's ball took place April 14, 1868, the hostess appearing as Folly. Mr. McAllister and W. C. Ralston both wore court costumes. Miss Carrie Gwin was a Greek maiden; Miss Lizzie Friedlander (Mrs. A. J. Bowie), appeared as Pride; Tiburcio was the Postilion of Longoumeau. A costume which attracted much attention and admiration was "Sport," worn by Miss Lily Hitchcock, now Mrs. Coit. It was from Paris, and was perfect in all details—the jockey cap, whip, and the winning posts on the skirt were all represented to the life, and the character admirably sustained.

Mrs. Howard's ball was of such recent date it can be remembered by all. The query now is, Who will give the next?

Those who enjoy the sight of a valuable and extensive collection of Japanese curios, antiques, and all such rare and quaint handiwork just now so popular, cannot afford to miss a visit to the store of George T. Marsh & Co., at 625 Market street under the Palace hotel.

Want a New Commission. The discovery that such a thing as land frauds has from time to time disgraced the fair fame of the State abroad, has awakened the Board of Trade to the necessity for a Commission supervisory of matters of the kind. It would not be a had idea, were it not just possible that some other people in the State are very timid of these Commissions, believing that they are only calculated to provide positions for political sharpers, who are always on the look-out for some plausible opportunity of the kind to saddle new burdens upon the public in the form of taxation for salaries. The cheapest and quite as effective way to check frauds of the kind would be to leave their eradication in the hands of the Board of Trade, in conjunction with the various Chambers of Commerce throughout the State. The mere stamp of disapproval set on any scheme emanating from California by such a reputable body of officials would nip it in the bud. It will be hoped that they will view matters in this light, and refrain from any endeavor to add to the already long and unnecessary list of office holders dependent upon the public purse for support. When committees from these eminently respectable bodies mentioned are detailed, their scope might be widened to act on mining as well as land frauds, from which as much, if not more, danger is to be feared. The prompt manner in which the Alina scheme was killed in London some months ago, shows how easy it is to stop a promoter's game when taken in its initiatory stages by exposure of its true merits in the right quarter. The mere announcement that these gentlemen will act in the matter will have the effect of restoring confidence at once among foreign investors, much more so than if a Commission is appointed, engineered in the interests of political cliques, and worth more to them than to any one else.

Will History Repeat Itself. With the probability of a compact being concluded between the local powder companies comes the question, how long will it last before the Eastern competitors take a hand in the game for the benefit of the consumers in Western territory? Of course, it will be a grand thing, this 2 cents a pound profit on the manufacture, while it lasts, and the companies are certainly entitled to fair returns on their output. It is a pity, however, that the business on the coast is always open to attacks from abroad, which even a combination of home interests cannot hope to offset. The next question which suggests itself is, will the California company's shares double up in market value on the consummation of the combine, as the Giants have already more than done under manipulation upon the mere contemplation of the proposition? And if not, why not? The California is a large and wealthy concern, while the Giant is bigger in its name than in any other respect, besides being loaded down with an indebtedness of over $200,000. It will take many a dividend to clear that off or to reimburse shareholders for the necessary assessment, should one be levied, and yet it is possible people can be found ready to argue the merits of these shares as an investment and defend an advance in price, which has already sent the stock up from $17 to the neighborhood of $32. It is only just to presume, however, in their behalf, that all fools are not yet dead in the world.

The Clearing House Officers. At the twenty-first annual meeting of the San Francisco Clearing House Association Tuesday, the following officers were elected for 1897: President, Thomas Brown; Vice-president, H. Wadsworth; Secretary, John D. McKee. The following Clearing House Committee was chosen: Thomas Brown, Cashier Bank of California; Ign. Steinhart, Manager Anglo-Californian Bank, Ltd.; S. G. Murphy, President First National Bank of San Francisco; H. M. J. McMichael, Agent Bank of British North America; W. H. Crocker, President Crocker-Woolworth National Bank of San Francisco.

The Pine Street Market.

Con.-Cal.-Virginia holds up at the advanced prices and keeps the speculative market together; otherwise there would be but little to say in regard to mining matters on Pine street. The goose that laid the golden egg has been pretty well battered to death, and by the men who have all along been most highly benefited. After first driving all the heavy-weight mining managers from the street, they turned their attention to their customers, with such good results that about one in twenty now put a dollar into the business. They sang a song of wild cats to very good effect in this manner, during the recent rise in Chollar, and now they are paying for the music in good style. If the development in Con.-Cal.-Virginia holds out, it may tempt the big people back into the market, forgetful of past grievances against the "new" broker in the old building, and this will prove the salvation of the market, the decline in which has hurt San Francisco more than all other untoward influences combined. The merchants and stuffy moralists who worked and preached against stock gambling in the past, are now ready to take a hand in reanimating the moribund Exchange, appreciating fully what its loss has cost them. It will be hoped, for the sake of all, that their repentance is not too late. Its revival would do more to enliven local trade than any other panacea which might be suggested. A little reconstruction in the personnel of the Exchange might also aid in bringing it more prominently to the front again as a factor in local prosperity.

A Clearer Atmosphere.

It is pleasant to be in a position to say that in so far as mining promotion is concerned, California was never healthier than it is at present. The thieving promoter has not found his game profitable, and the outlook is not favorable that he will. While starting off some months ago, with the best of intentions to make a fortune at one fell and dishonest swoop, they have been brought up so sharply on every turn that they are forced to retire from the field. Their numbers are now few, and being well known, their every movement is closely watched, with the chances that when they inaugurate any new scheme of robbery it will not escape unnoticed. As it is, mining is active all over the State, with capital available for all legitimate operations. Investors are now, fortunately for themselves, turning their attention to the development of new and young prospects, instead of wasting time in the attempt to float old shells of properties on the strength of a reputation very poorly earned, if all was told in many cases. One of the old veterans is never trotted to the front without recalling the story of a well-known Wall-street broker, who drawled out, in response to the tale of a promoter about the millions a mine he was offering had produced, "Well, why the d—l did you not bring it to me before you took those millions out."

Wise in their Generation.

A good story is going the rounds of local mining men. A few weeks ago, a new arrival, with "connections abroad," reaching out for a ready-made fortune like so many others who think all they have to do is to poke a mine under some other fellow's nose, with more money than brains, and empty his pockets of cash, sent home a most elaborate description of a Calaveras property at the instance of the man who held the bond. Its location was shown to be excellent, right in touch with one of the most celebrated mines in the State, and its record was grand. Not a State Mineralogist's report had appeared for years which did not give considerable space to the mine, its geological construction, etc., with as much deference as could be shown had its owner belonged on the inside of the mining ring and a power in the land. With the caution now existing in London, the correspondence in due course found its way back to a true and trusted correspondent in San Francisco, who in turn sent his report. The answer came at last to the anxious youth, whose nerves were wrought up by impatience to the highest tension. It was short, but to the point: "The best thing you can do, if you wish to be safe, is to put six thousand miles between you and this property." It might be added that the young gentleman has given up mining promotion as a business, content to amble along at his profession, at which he is more at home.

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

THE gentle dames of Nevada are anxious to obtain the permission of public opinion to see Bob and Jim maul one another in the arena. And some will doubtless put in appearance, and tell public opinion to mind its own business. The curiosity of the sex is simply boundless. They have penetrated our clubs, until there is no corner secure from them; their silvery laughter reaches us from the side entrance, when we are sipping our grog at the bar of our favorite tavern; and we are with us on the race track betting fast, and furiously; and now they would invade the sanctity of the prize ring which we want to preserve for our own special brutality. Possibly, like the Roman ladies, they would not object to patting Bob and Jim on their brawny mucleles, even as they wagered their sesterces upon their prowess. This of course Mrs. Bob, and Mrs. Jim would not endure. No, we cannot have it. Let them get up their own prize fights, and have Sally and Bet a slogging for a sealskin, or a diamond pin. We have no use for them at our box office.

IF poor old Jouah could have known the fuss those New York parsons are making about him, he would have seen that bleeding whale in Hades or Oakland before he crawled into his belly. You actor, seeking a new gag or a new gesture, you editor, scratching your bald pate for the idea that cometh not, you artist, dozing over your mail stick because you can imagine nothing to paint—vacuous though ye be, are running over with thought and originality by comparison with the intellectual straits of the modern preacher. Because congregations do not pay salaries of thousands a year for chestnuts. They want excitement. They are tired of being lugged along over the same old paths. Their gorge rises at text and psalm. Hence, the brain-tickling problem which Parson Abbott has started, and Jonah and the whale are once more trotted out to mystify the Christian world with their importance as a factor in salvation.

GO it Gerty, prithee, sweet Atherton, hit thy gentle countrywomen again, and again, yea till their corsets crack. For thou art indeed a most winsome scold, and thy acrid discourse is well seasoned with common sense. Not that they will take heed in the least. True, they will call you, Gerty, a "nawsty" mean thing, and try to dig up stories about you, but His Grace, the Duke, and My Lord the Earl will be as fondly worshipped as ever. And so it will be until Congress passes a bill for the Protection of the American Heiress from the European Nobility, and makes it a penal offense for any young American wage earner to remain unmarried after thirty-five.

AT Dr. Jordan's grave and learned pate
Strange epithets from pulpits now are flying;
A score or more of ministers irate
Predict for him a most caloric fate
In which the man of science will be frying
Upon the Devil's pitchfork, to a turn.
Methinks this much of truth I can discern:
Compared with those who do the vilifying
This Palo Alto man has brains to burn.

"THE new woman will bring up new virtues," says an enthusiastic emancipator of feminine persuasion. That's all right, sister. From what has been seen of some of the advance guard, it seems that she will not have much trouble protecting the new brands of virtues. What is really needed nowadays is less of the new woman and more of the old virtues.

THE United States navy is having a mighty hard time of it on the other side. Our great sea captains had better get through sinking ships at the wharves, running on mud banks, and coming out bunged up after a cap full of wind, before we decide upon chastising anybody.

AN amateur sleuth, who takes much pride in the keenness of his scent, is now prepared to furnish evidence that Chief Clerk Duckworth is the man that stole the 'loast pig from Little Pete's grave. And the pig wasn't red hot, either.

IMAGINE, ye anglers, Senator Fair humming, "Tomorrow will be Friday so we'll fish the stream to-day," whistling to Herbert Clark, his valet, putting a dynamite cartridge into one pocket and a sandwich in the other, and starting off for a days sport in the Colorado. For such, it appears, was the direction the Senator's love for the angle took. No stupid waiting on the bank for him, watching the float that would not down, or casting the feathered lure. He was a miner, and he'd blast a trout with the same alacrity as a porphyry horse. And then after the day's sport the worthy Senator would refresh himself by a set-to with the useful valet, and punch him all over the room. Herbert's private opinion of his Master would not place him among the heroic.

GO to, thou croaker, who complainest of hard times. Hard times, forsooth! Come with me to that quarter where the men of France provide rare things to eat for the youth yeleft "ye blood," and the fair woman who doth with him consort. Harken to the pop of the foaming wine, and let the lucense of rich and rare dishes permeate thy nostrils. Mark the fragrance of the weed of Cuba, and ponder that its price represents a meal for a small family, while the wine bill alone would keep Jack Hand-saw, uow out of employment, and his wife and bairns for a week. And then prattle of hard times. The world rolls on as merrily as ever, and the Maccaroni band playeth "Sweet Alice Ben Bolt" in the hall. What, because thou art dyspeptic, shall there be no more cakes and ale?

THE Art Association people are getting ready for their annual masquerade ball. May it be a jolly one, with plenty of ginger. Ay, that's just what those balls want, an infusion of the French spirit, the happy, dashing, risqué go, which is the charm of the masquerade. It don't do, young people, to go creeping bashfully about the floor, feeling horribly awkward, the girls inclined to resent the badinage of the hour, and the men grouped together in a "don't-want-to-get-snubbed" fashion. Sail in for all the business is worth. Don't be too coldly respectable. It does not go, and this is the reason those shady parties en masque are so delightful. Kick up your heels, and let the chaperone take care of themselves.

BILL ENGLISH, the eminent statesman, is said to bear a close resemblance to the Earl De Courcy Duff, who passed through this city recently on his return from India, where he was Governor of a province in the north. General Clunie, who is something of a wit, upon hearing this, remarked that Mr. English might be dubbed the Earl of Plum Duff, because he has a neat knack of picking the plums out of the political dough. Well, he works for them, and the laborer is worthy of his hire.

"SATAN'S KISS" was the subject of the Reverend M. P. Boyntou's sermon last Sunday night, and the speaker dilated accordingly upon the mischief wrought by the arch demon in his osculatory diversions. For real havoc, however, pecuniary and otherwise, Satan's salute isn't in it with the confusion that two rosy lips can cause, in testifying to the bestowal of kisses prior to the filing of a breach-of-promise suit.

WILLIE Hearst, Willie Hearst, bring your broom along,
And sweep the office clear, my lad, of Lawrence, they call Long;
For if you don't, the fact will be too very clearly seen,
That you, not Andy Lawrence, deserve the name of Green.

HOW merrily Oakland and its adjuncts keep the clerical scandal-pot a boiling. The lusty cheeks of Jack Satan are ever distended to bursting, blowing ou the embers which heat this devil's broth to the nauseous pitch. It was always thus, and the oldest inhabitant in that strange city fails to remember a scandalless month in its history.

BETWEEN those admirable pillars of the law, Judges Campbell and Low, yawns a gulf which the soothing hand of time can never fill. Since the largely whiskered jurist flattened out the blatant clerk O'Brien, the hot blood of his clan is as easily stirred up as a bread poultice when de push whistle up "The Campbells are Comin'."

REMOVE the Capital? Legislators pray,
If you remove it, set it far away;
Too close already grind its noxious mills,
Its stenchy scandals and its thieving bills.

ANTONY TO CLEOPATRA—ALICE MACKAY, IN PALL MALL MAGAZINE.

PALE Death awaits me, shadow-robed in sable,
 Whilst in yon western blue the sunset burns!
 Sweet Love! awake, as thou alone art able,
 To one last thrill this dying heart that turns
 Ever to thee,—for thee, thee only, yearns.
 Most lovely Love! my Queen divinely moulded!
 Come to me, come! To be by thee caress'd
 Was ever heav'n to me; to die enfolded
 Within thy perfect arms were to die blest;
 Nor could Elysium's self hold fairer rest.
 Sweet voice! most dulcet music! thou dost 'thrall me
 As Orpheus and Arion 'thrall'd at will
 The realms of Dis and Neptune; thou dost call me
 From the gray shades of death! thy tender thrill
 Lures back my fading soul—thy captive still!
 Sweet eyes! twin stars of my sole heav'n, oh, never May I awake away from thee, to drink
 New life from lesser light; rather for ever
 And ever let me sleep on Lethe's brink;
 Nor 'neath Acheron's waters dreamless sink.
 Light me but to Oblivion, eyes most tender!
 For since the Gods do will that I must lose
 Thy starry golden glow and dusky splendour,
 I ask but to forget my loss; I choose
 Oblivion's wave before Elysian dews.
 Dear Love! so witching are thy warm caresses,
 That Death stands back a pace, to watch their wiles;
 From thy soft breath, and loosen'd dmsy tresses
 Doth float a dreamy fragrance, that beguiles
 Like musky zephyrs from Hesperian isles.
 O flow'r-soft crimson lips! the sweetest portals
 To sweetest soul e'er fashioned! not the wine
 Nectar'd in Naxos by the fair immortals,
 Could give my fainting pulses so divine,
 So rich a transient life, as kiss of thine.
 Love! I complain not, tho' Death come to take
 To realms of Nothingness ere thy last kiss
 Hath tired upon my lips, for thou dost make me
 To fade so happily, dissolved in bliss,
 That sweet it seems to die, if death be this!

A VALENTINE.—LIZETTE WOODWORTH REESE, IN SCRIPPER'S.

Against this thorny Present shows
 Your memory like the dew;
 Each maid a wrinkled Beauty goes,
 When I do think of you.
 Folded away in the deep grass,
 What is it can befall?
 Nor Clouds that fade, nor Gusts that pass,
 Nor any Griet at all.
 Now lovers write their verses brave;
 Now buds start on the tree;
 But Love went with you to the grave,
 The sere leaf bides with me.
 I have not any word save this;
 My tears are all my store;
 The fairer that the weather is
 I miss you but the more.

TWO DREAMS.—MARIE M. A. BULAU, IN THE IDLER.

When violets in bushland hollows blow,
 When tints and tones enchant and heaven seems nigh,
 We had a dream in common, you and I—
 Who was the wiser dreamer time must show.
 The happier dreamer of us did not know
 The lyric light and love were all a lie,
 That when the blue grew greyer in the sky,
 The other dreamer and the dream would go!
 The wild white violets in flower will see
 One dreamer lying where two kissed last May;
 The winds and streams in undertones will play
 The finish of a fitful melody.
 Best for that dreamer, too, if he forget
 The tender song whose burden is regret.

DEAR EDITH:—You may not know that the heliotrope lining that has become so popular was first worn by Mrs. Bradley Martin, who has just given the great fancy dress ball at the Waldorf. It is a very swell material and is entitled to a long popularity.

I notice that the finest of boleros are made of exquisite black satin richly embroidered with gold, and they give an air of completeness to a toilet made up of a black satin skirt and blouse. By the way, this golden bolero was created by the Countess Castellane, and all womankind are indebted to her for the garment. I recently saw, with a black satin skirt, a pretty blouse of black chiffon worn. The lining was of black satin, and the chiffon was put on in narrow bias folds that encircled the entire bodice. At the head of each fold there was a narrow beading of coral passementerie that shown out conspicuously. The high coat sleeves of black satin were covered with folds of the chiffon and passementerie. They were long and pointed, with a frill of black chiffon falling quite over the hand. The high collar and ceinture were of coral satin ribbon.

Over this chiffon waist a black satin bolero was worn. It was short, with broad pointed reverses, that were elaborately embroidered in gold and coral, and a narrow running design of embroidery outlined.

A very dressy evening waist is of pale yellow mousseline de soie over yellow satin. The mousseline de soie is put on very full from the shoulder seams and is drawn down into a pointed girdle of turquoise velvet that is embroidered in stones. The yoke is composed of three ruffles of the mousseline de soie that commence at the shoulder seams and overlap each other slightly to form a long yoke effect.

A narrow edge of cream Valenciennes outlines the bottom of each ruffle. Over the shoulder seams there are broad epaulettes of the embroidered turquoise that merge into long stole ends at the front of the bodice and hang loose to the girdle. The tall crush collar is of turquoise velvet. This waist is in the trousseau of Countess Czaykowski.

A chic silk blouse for an afternoon house toilet is made of a heavy quality of surah silk in citron green, with a thread check in black. The back of the blouse is seamless, with the fullness at the waist line caught in tiny plaits under a crush bias girdle of the silk. The front has a bolero effect of the silk, edged with a frill of white mousseline de soie, and from under the bolero the silk falls in two cascades divided by a vest of white mousseline de soie bordered with narrow violet velvet ribbon. These waists, though having an elegant sound, are not necessarily expensive. If worn by Parisian women they are sure to be cheap. One old skirt will form the body of half a dozen waists, and for waist trimmings even the ruchings of old hats are utilized, while we would buy new goods. I took a snap shot of three of them in the afternoon room of the Countess Castellane—the prankish kitten in their midst.

One of the very latest black skirts is built of glace moire. It is round at the bottom, and the godets start back of the hips and flare very much as they near the bottom of the skirt. Viewed from the front the skirt is straight, and would be clinging if it were possible for glace moire to cling.

The fashion for paste buttons is being followed by a craze for miniature buttons. Exquisitely tinted maideas look at you in a row, with eyes calm, serene and blue.

Weak Men and Women Should use DAMIANA BITTERS, the great Mexican remedy; it gives health and strength to the Sexual Organs. Depot at 233 Market street, San Francisco. (Send for circular.)

ON one of the most stormy nights last week, Walter Hobart telephoned to Henry J. Crocker, asking him to come over to the big Hobart house on Van Ness Avenue. His brother-in-law, Winthrop Lester, was convalescing after an attack of la grippe, and Hobart explained that he wished to amuse the invalid. Crocker responded with cheerfulness, and found that the prospective amusement comprised a lively game of poker. Nothing loth, he sat down, and the game progressed with satisfactory results to all the players except the host. Walter is reputed a good loser, so he stood his losses like a little man, and as the night was wild and the rain beating violently against the windows, he solaced himself with many and copious draughts of hot Irish. The game continued to go very badly for Hobart. He never held better than a moderately good hand, and whenever his cards indicated a possible winning, Crocker or Lester would just manage to beat him with cards a little better. Even Hobart's affection for his sick Santa Monica brother-in-law began to weaken under the strain of such a continuous run of bad luck, and his lugubriousness was evident. As the night waned, the game was temporarily abandoned for a hot bird and a cold bottle. After supper, play was resumed.

"Now, Walt., I think your luck will change," said Crocker, whose turn it was to deal. "We have had a break, and now we will take a fresh pack, and I shall be surprised if they do not come your way."

He dealt the cards, and Hobart could hardly preserve his equanimity when he found four jacks in his hand. The others plainly had high cards, too, for they proceeded to make a pretty stiff pot. Hobart languidly discarded one card and reluctantly came in, as if he had two pair or three very small ones. He affected to study his hand intently after the draw, but really did not glance at his fifth card. After Lester and Crocker had raised each other until they were tired, Hobart took a hand and made a big bet. The others, believing him to be bluffing, promptly saw his raise, and before the play ended, the "pot" was quite the biggest of the evening. When his play was finally called, Hobart threw down his hand, and without waiting for any announcements, gattered in the "pot," which contained enough chips to recoup him for all the losses of the evening. Lester picked up Hobart's cards.

"Why, you have the joker here," he exclaimed. "Drop that dough!"

And so it was. Crocker had failed to remove the joker from the new pack after supper, and Hobart had not examined his fifth card after the draw. Of course, the pot had to be divided between the three, but Walter swore that Crocker had stacked the cards, and so the game broke up.

Supper in the Red Room after the play is all the go at the Bohemian Club now. And certainly nothing can be more pleasing and delightfully artistic than the subdued and warm light of this beautiful room, which has not its parallel in any club in the world—the pleasant music in the corridor during the supper, and the exquisite taste in which everything is served. Those little fêtes are dear to the female heart, and keep the Bohemians at the top notch of favor.

William Greer Harrison is one of the best-hearted men in town, and he always avoids hurting the feelings of anyone. To oblige an old acquaintance, whose circumstances were not prosperous, he took in as office boy the son of his old friend, and tried faithfully to give the lad an insight into the mysteries of insurance as practiced on California street. It was no use, however. The half-grown boy had no thoughts for business, and although always in his place, took little interest in his work, and Mr. Harrison grew very tired of his protégé. How to get rid of him was a problem. For the sake of the boy's father he did not wish to dismiss him, but his presence made Greer feel blue. By chance, he heard that a warehouse firm wished an office boy, so he lost no time in advising the boy to apply for the place, as presenting greater possibilities for promotion. After a personal application the boy returned, and said he could have the coveted place, provided he could secure a recommendation from his present employer. Harrison hesitated at this stipulation. He could not conscientiously recommend a boy of whom he was trying to rid himself. Finally, an idea struck him, and he wrote a certificate of good character, concluding as follows:

"He is a very good boy, but I cannot afford to wait until he grows."

On the strength of this recommendation the boy secured the place, and Harrison chuckles over his own emancipation.

A young Benedict, prominent in insurance circles, meeting an older married man on Montgomery street, greeted him with great effusiveness, invited him to have a drink, then insisted on giving him an expensive cigar, and finally another drink. The object of all this hospitality could not understand the unusual generosity of his host. After a time, however, the latter gave him an inkling that the treating was not entirely spontaneous.

"By the way," he said, "I want to buy a birthday present for a girl. Will you come and help me choose it?"

With some reluctance the other consented. The pair went to a large jewelry store, where the young married man selected a handsome pair of diamond garters.

"Now, look here," said the family man of experience; "that is a nice present for a young husband to give to a girl! What if your wife should come in here now?"

"Why, my dear boy," said the youngster, calmly, "that is just the reason I brought you along. If my wife should come in, you would be the purchaser of the garters, don't you see?"

"But my own wife—" began the other, in alarm.

"Oh, that's all right," said the young husband, reassuringly.

Charles M. Shortridge, publisher of the Call, has a good story, which he does not hesitate to tell about himself. After one of the most objectionable of the Examiner's cartoons in the series of pictorial battles now being waged between the Call and the ex-Monarch, an article was published in the Mission-street journal bitterly attacking Mr. Shortridge. On the afternoon of the same day, an Examiner reporter had the effrontery to try to interview Mr. Shortridge regarding the article, hoping to secure a new opportunity for misrepresenting the Call editor.

"Look here," said Shortridge, impulsively. "Here is a hundred dollars. You take that to the low-born wretch in your office." Shortridge's language was literally much more picturesque than the expurgated quotation. "When I use that expression," he continued, "I do not simply apply it as a contemptuous epithet. I mean it to include his entire family connection. You give that hundred dollars to the low-born wretch in your office if he will come into a room alone with me for ten minutes."

The reporter departed with the five twenties, and Mr. Shortridge has heard nothing more of the incident. He has neither money nor fight, and admits that he has been badly buncoed.

Gordon Ross, the young Scotch artist, was recently invited to join the Bohemian Club, and in a way they have in Bohemia, at the first club dinner after his election, he was put up on his feet to show his paces. Ross endeavored to rise to the occasion, and began telling a somewhat long-winded story about an owl and a freak of the aviary, which he dubbed a hoodoo bird. At the most thrilling part of the narrative, when Gordon was reproducing a dialogue between the two birds with even more than the usual thickness to the "burr" of his Highland accent, he asked dramatically:

"And what did the owl say?"

Louis Sloss, who was seated at the foot of the table, considered this opportunity too good to be lost, so when Ross asked what the owl said, Louis yelled in his best Scottish accent:

"Hoot, hoot, mon!" which brought down the house, and abruptly terminated the story.

INSURANCE.

ASSISTANT Manager Brewster of the Scottish Union & National, who has been in the city the past week for the purpose of selecting a Coast Manager for the company, has appointed Mr. R. C. Medcraft to that position. Mr. Medcraft has been associated with Wm. J. Landers, and is a well-justified choice for this important post.

The New Zealand Insurance Company, which has not visibly increased its local bank account during these troublous times, has found it necessary, in the interests of economy, to move into the offices of Smedberg & Mitchell.

The new company recently organized by the Northwestern Underwriters' National, will not at present do business on the Coast. Mr. George W. Turner, representing the parent company, is of opinion that the new organization will not enter this field before 1898. Agencies, however, will be established throughout the Eastern States.

Notwithstanding the hard times, several of the companies have gotten out beautifully illustrated and expensive calendars, and other advertising matter, for the present year. Among these, the Fireman's Fund presents its patrons with a sterling silver paper knife; the Norwich Union sends out a very handsome redwood calendar; the Pennsylvania, a calendar with very beautiful water color sketches of the Yosemite Valley, and there are many others.

A new company soon to enter this field is the Norwalk Fire Insurance Company of Norwalk, Conn., with assets of $447,000. This company, in connection with the London & Lancashire, of England, will issue a joint policy under the name of the English & American Underwriters. The combined assets of the companies are $3,176,716. This will be an important addition to the agency of Colonel Macdonald.

Judging from the circular letters being addressed to the members of the San Francisco Life Association by its new President, Clarence M. Smith, there is to be a vigorous effort made to inject some spirit into that association. To that end he has arranged for a series of banquets, the first to take place on the 12th of March, at which two parts of insurance lore to one of banquet, will delight and instruct the guests.

If the amount of industrial business done last year by the only insurance company writing this line on the Coast may be taken as a criterion, it will not be long before this rich field will be invaded by numerous of the hungry industrial companies doing business in the Eastern States.

The talk heard so frequently some time ago concerning the purchase of its charter and the revival of the old California Fire Insurance Company, has been silenced—presumably by the balance sheets turned up at the end of last year's business. It may be stated, in this connection, that the opinion of many local managers is that the disastrous war of the past year will not terminate until a great deal more of good money goes the way of the balances that made weary the hearts of the companies at the close of 1896.

It is a fixed principle of the surety companies to pursue defaulters and embezzlers on whose bonds they appear to the ends of the earth. They never compromise a case, even if every dollar taken he made good. They believe that fear of bitter consequences are a powerful incentive to integrity upon the part of the insured.

GREAT singers are noted for their refined gastronomic tastes. Thus Cavalier A. L. Guille, the tenor now at the Orpheum, is a pronounced epicure. He likes nothing better than good eating, and he takes his meals regularly at the Maison Tortoni, where everything served is of the very best.

THERE being tragedy, farce-comedy, and music to choose from to suit all tastes, it is not much wonder that theatre parties have again been in evidence this week at the different houses. Miss Sachs' party at the Baldwin, on Monday evening, was one of the largest of the season, twenty guests being entertained by Spartacus, and afterwards at supper at the Sachs residence on Post street. Mrs. McCutcheon's recent theatre party had Miss Della Davidson as guest of honor, supper following at the University Club.

The last cotillion of the Friday Night Club, at Odd Fellows' Hall, was extremely pleasant. Mr. Greenway led with Miss Della Davidson, and the advantage of having the five figures danced, all old favorites, was shown by the smoothness and rapidity with which they were gone through. The supper was excellent, as usual, and afterwards there was general dancing. The final meeting of the club has by general consent been postponed until after Easter. On Saturday evening Donald Smith led the cotillion of the Saturday Night Club at Lunt's Hall, and three pretty figures were danced.

The tea given by Consul and Mrs. Simpson last Saturday served the double purpose of a house-warming of their handsome new house on Vallejo street, and the introduction to society of their beautiful daughter, Miss Agnes. Mrs. and Miss Simpson received their guests in the white and gold drawing-room to the left of the large hall, which is the feature of the lower part of the dwelling, the guests wandering at will through the rest of the house, which was almost entirely thrown open, and artistically decorated with smilax and roses, a number of young ladies in attendance looking after their creature comforts from the lunch table. A stringed orchestra, stationed in an alcove in the ball, performed some pretty concert selections during the afternoon. Later, Mrs. Simpson entertained a large party at dinner, and in the evening there was a dance in the ballroom. The tea given by Mrs. Crockett the same day was charming from its very informality, and the belles enjoyed the unusually large attendance of the beaux.

Mrs. Henry Scott is being regarded as a good fairy by the buds, as the ball she gave on Thursday evening in honor of three débutantes, the Misses Crittenden, Crockett and Hopkins, was another of those delightful parties she knows so well how to give. Nearly all the young people of the swim were present, and amid lovely floral surroundings they merrily danced the hours away, a delicious supper being served at midnight.

The 400 Club had a dance at Lunt's Hall, on Tuesday evening, and last night the Friday Fortnightly Club had another meeting, and it goes without saying they had a very pleasant time. To-day Mrs. W. B. Carr gives a tea at her residence on Wasbington street. To-morrow afternoon Mrs. David Bixler will make her first appearance as a hostess this winter. Last season her Sunday afternoon musicales were quite a feature, and the one which she has arranged for to-morrow bids fair to be an extremely pleasant gathering. It will be in the nature of a farewell compliment to Sigmund Beal, who is on the eve of departure for Europe, whither he goes with the intention of spending a year in musical studies. Next Monday evening, the club of that name, gives its final dance of the season at Golden Gate Hall.

The Olympic Club will make a new departure at their next Ladies' Night, which will be on the 2d of March, inasmuch as for the first time a dramatic performance will be given for the entertainment of their guests. The Webbling sisters have been secured for this purpose, and it is expected they will make as great a sensation as they have hitherto done both in Europe and in other parts of the United States. Invitations are out for the Mardi Gras ball at the Art Institute on Nob Hill, and the indications are that it will be a great success.

Miss Gerstle's tea next Saturday will be a very elaborate affair, as following the afternoon reception will be a dinner party, which in turn will be succeeded by a dance. Miss Edith McBean's recent tea was for young people only, and in spite of the very disagreeable weather a large number of her friends responded. Mrs. Ehrman's luncheon was one of those dainty affairs for which the hostess is celebrated among her friends. The dinner presided over by Mrs. P. N. Lilienthal was very elaborate, twenty guests were entertained, including Baron Marx, in whose honor the dinner was given.

At Union Square Hall last Wednesday evening, Miss Annie Harris and A. N. Jackson were united in marriage by Rabbi Levy. The hall was elaborately dressed with ferns and flowers and filled with guests to witness the ceremony, which took place at half-past six. The bridal robe was of rich white silk, trimmed with duchess lace. Miss Minnie Lasky, who was maid of honor, was gowned in corn-colored silk. The Misses Sadie Jewell, Gertie Berliner, Birdie Samuels and Ray Coho, who officiated as the bridesmaids, wore white, yellow and blue gowns. J. Woods was best man. Following the ceremony the company partook of an elaborate dinner, and later dancing was indulged in for several hours. The Concordia club rooms is the place selected for the wedding of Miss Hilda Levy and Joshua Eppinger, which is to take place on Tuesday evening, the second of March.

The society wedding of next week will be that of Miss Martha Gibbs and Walter J. Holcomb, which will take place at the Gibbs residence on Post street, on Wednesday evening. The wedding robe is spoken of as a dream of loveliness, and the wedding presents already received by the fair bride-elect as "simply gorgeous."

Charitable affairs are taking quite a large slice out of society's time this month, the musicale at Mrs. B. F. Norris's on Sacramento street, on Wednesday evening, being the chief one this week. It was given by the Doctor's Daughters, and included, besides vocal music, selections by the guitar and mandolin club of Berkeley, and delicious refreshments.

And now comes the Bishop Armitage Orphanage, promising a society amateur performance at the California Theatre, for the benefit of that institution, about the end of this month, so that we have two theatrical entertainments in prospect, the other being the Maria Kip Orphanage performance of Caste, which, from the well-known talent of the players in it, is eagerly anticipated. Neither the name of the play nor the participants for the Armitage performance have as yet been made public, but it is said there will be a surprise when they are announced.

With the coming of the lovely spring days, which usually fall to our share during March, society is anticipating a short sojourn in the country, especially as Lent, coming just then, it will be dull in town. So rooms are already in request at the Hotel Rafael for that period: in fact, quite a number are already domiciled at that most pleasant hostelry, where all the comforts of home can be had, in addition to the other many charms it possesses, to say nothing of the beauty of the surrounding country and the soft, balmy air of the Valley.

Edgar Mills and his sisters, the Misses Addie and Florence, and W. F. Goad and his daughters Aileen and Genevive, were among the East-bound departures last week. D. O. Mills is with us again, coming here for a brief visit to look after his California property.

An entertainment of unusual interest will be given next Thursday evening, the 18th inst., at Golden Gate Hall, in aid of the furnishing fund of St. Paul's Episcopal Church. A select musical programme will be rendered, and Gibson's pictures will be presented, the whole to close with dancing.

Are you willing to try a new tea at our expense? Your grocer will sell you a package of Schilling's Best, and return your money in full if you don't like it.

Prices low, but enough.

On Tuesday, February 23rd, a Lady Washington tea will be held at the residence of Mrs. Will E. Fisher, 1210 Sutter street, for the benefit of the Nathaniel Gray Free Kindergarten. Tickets can be obtained from Mrs. M. R. Higgins, President, Mrs. C. S. Wright, Mrs. F. L. Whitney, Mrs. H. E. Huntington, Mrs. L. A. Kelly, Mrs. John Flournoy, Mrs. J. Stow Ballard, Mrs. M. H. Myrick, Mrs. John Haynes, Mrs. George Ashton, Mrs. George Easton, Mrs. Ralph Hooper, and other ladies on the Board of Managers.

Among the most recent California arrivals at the St. Denis Hotel, New York, are noted Miss Spring, George G. Foche, W. J. Hotchkiss, E. C. Searey, and George Palmer.

AT THE RACES.

THE sport has been somewhat tame this week, owing to the inclement weather, and the mudlarks have had an inning; still a very large crowd witnessed a good day's sport on closing day at Ingleside. The attraction being the Hobart Stakes at a mile and a sixteenth, which were won in a clever style by Mr. Dunne's Damien—the favorite in the betting—from Salvation, a son of the great Salvador, and that other game race horse, Schiller.

The re-opening at Oakland has been fairly well attended, although the first two days' racing was of the tame order, with the exception of the San Leandro Stakes, when only four horses started. The stake was captured by Mr. Dunne's Estaca.

A feature of the racing on Tuesday was the magnificent riding of Charley Thorpe, who landed four winners.

Ingleside re-opens on February 22nd, for two weeks, during which time four stake races are to be decided and three two-year-old events. Secretary Leake is arranging another long distance programme for the coming meeting at Ingleside.

Mr. Dunne, the St. Louis turfman, with his very select string of horses, seems to be capturing all of the big purses, and he will certainly carry off the stake honors unless California turfmen trot out their best; and they certainly will have to bring out their best ones to beat him—for Mr. Dunne tries to have the best that can be procured. As he remarks: "It costs mouey to ship horses across the continent, and you must have good ones to get it back again."

An attractive programme is promised for Saturday's races at Oakland, which will include two hurdle races, a two-mile race and three other events.

THE fear of Japanese competition in American markets is being dispelled by recent consular reports. It is shown that since the war with China wages have risen more than 100 per cent. in nearly every department of skilled labor. In addition to this, the blessings of civilization are observed there in labor disturbances, strikes, boycotts, and the denial to workmen to earn a living in the sweat of their faces, just as is the rule here. Japan is rapidly civilizing.

THE probable suppression of Chinatown, and the consequent curtailment of long-enjoyed emoluments from that direction, may account for the very persistent efforts now being made at Sacramento to give the police salary list a boost.

THE report comes from Sacramento that the Legislature will adjourn sine die on the 13th of March. Hitherto the number 13 has been hailed as a harbinger of ill-luck. Henceforth let it be made a day of rejoicing.

A Heart Searcher

I WAS Professor Pepper's only heir. Among his effects I found in his laboratory after his untimely departure was the curious mechanism he called his "heart searcher." In appearance it resembled an ordinary watch. Of its internal mechanism I know nothing. Professor Pepper regarded the instrument as the greatest invention of the age, and he always refused to explain its principles of construction, as he had an idea that if the world knew how it was made the market would be flooded with imitation heart searchers.

Fortunately for me, the Professor's invention was accompanied by a card of "directions for use," so that I had no difficulty in testing its great value as an aid in the search after truth. The instrument had a face like an ordinary watch, except that there was only one hand or pointer, and in place of the usual twelve figures there were the names of the moral and immoral sentiments. At the top, opposite the stem or hands, was the zero mark, and when not in use the pointer rested at the zero or neutral mark. From the stem extended two insulated wires about a yard long, and at the end of these wires was a flat ivory disk that could be easily hid in the hand.

My first experiment with the Professor's heart searcher was calculated to inspire confidence in the invention. It told the truth with refreshing exactitude. I had at the time of the Professor's demise been dwelling in a state of rather distressing uncertainty concerning the feelings of my fourth cousin, Amy Clinket, toward myself. My own feelings were quite clear, at least to myself. She seemed to be all that was most desirable in a young woman. I wanted to tell her how much I loved her, and had not dared, being uncertain of the result of any such declaration. The heart searcher! Fortunate legacy! It might tell me all, and then I could cheerfully propose, knowing in advance that I would be accepted.

First, it might be desirable to test the heart searcher upon some minor subject. It was the first experiment that led me to press boldly forward in the search for the pure truth. I placed the heart searcher in my vest pocket and secured it there with a watch chain, to give the impression that I had my watch with me. The wires I passed through the sleeve of my coat, leaving the ivory disk just hid in my cuff. Thus armed, I set forth in the quest of the unknowable. I took the trolley car, intending to make calls. In the car I met my young niece Diana, aged seven. Slipping the disk into my hand, I cordially shook her hand and pressed the disk against her active little pulse. Pretending to be absorbed in learning the time of day, I asked her sundry questions, and at once saw pictured on the dial of the heart searcher every passing change in the dear child's transparent nature.

"Are you not glad to see me, dear?"
The pointer swung slowly around to "delight."
"What are your views, my child, upon the subject of caramels?"

The pointer on the dial promptly moved to "hope." This was significant. Clearly the heart searcher was a most important invention.

The dear child at once expressed herself as interested in caramels, concluding her remarks with the information that she knew of a place where they sold "two for five." Manifestly the instrument and my young relative's words did not agree. She was evidently torn with conflicting emotions, for the pointer quivered slightly, and moved to "disappointment." She did not wish to plainly ask for caramels, and yet in the deep recesses of her young heart she hoped I would give her some.

"I am very sorry, my child, but I have no caramels with me. If I had only known I should meet you, I would have brought some with me."

The pointer was greatly agitated and vibrated between "disappointment" and "doubt."

I at once offered the child a dime, and to my amazement the dial indicated "disappointment" only.

"Oh, I beg pardon. Let me see. Was that a quarter? Dear me. I'm sorry I made such a mistake. Here's a quarter."

At once the pointer swung swiftly to "delight."

The heart searcher was a triumphant success. I squeezed the dear child's hand once more. The dial marked "gratitude."

"Good-by, dear. I must get off here."

She smiled sweetly and said, "They give twelve for a quarter." This seemed to be truth based upon experience, and did not need examination by the Professor's wonderful instrument.

As I left the car, I saw young Brown of our office walking quickly down the street, as if in haste to catch a train. I grasped his hand fervently. "My dear boy, I'm so glad to meet you. How is your mother and your sister-in-law and your brother, Theodore Augustus? You have plenty of time," I remarked, as I pretended to look at my watch.

He pulled his brawny hand away and said in his usual breezy manner: "Delighted to meet you. Good-by—train—awful late. By—"

He was gone, and I gazed upon the white face of the heart searcher. Although disconnected with my friend's pulse, the pointer still lingered at "botheration." It was more than an hour before it finally settled back to zero. Brown had evidently a powerful emotional nature.

The heart searcher was a remarkable instrument. It reported the exact emotional truth concerning the subject. It was indeed a boon to bashful lovers. They could, by its skillful use, ascertain the exact state of the beloved one's heart without the distressing uncertainty of a formal proposal. I would at once put it to its greatest test. If it proved successful, I could proceed to manufacture heart searchers upon a large scale, and no doubt live in comfort upon the resulting profits.

Amy was at home when I called, and when I shook her hand warmly I glanced hastily at the telltale dial—"expectation." This was encouraging. I would proceed to unfold my tale of love. I still held her hand with loverlike fervor and stammered forth my blushing confession. At intervals I glanced at the white face of the heart searcher. Its sensitive pointer, was greatly agitated and quivered from "surprise" to "anger" and from "anger" to "cold disdain." Finally it stopped at "doubt."

"But my dear, I—I love you."

The fatal words were out.

"I don't believe one word you say. You are looking at your watch all the time, just to see how soon you can go."

The heart searcher fell from my nerveless hand and was dashed to a hundred pieces.

No. I never repaired it. Amy has convinced me that it is, in the words of the poet, "better not to know." The unknowable is the truly wise.

Amy? Oh pardon me. She married another man.—Charles Barnard in Home Magazine.

AT THE CAPITOL.

SACRAMENTO, February 11, 1897.

NOT since the time when ex-Assemblyman Ellwood Bunker stood up before his colleagues and made a fruitless appeal to them to save him from the disgrace of being found guilty of the charge of accepting a bribe, has there been such a scene in either house of the Legislature as was enacted Wednesday last, when the report of the Duckworth investigating committee was acted upon by the Assembly. The Assembly chamber was crowded with people, and there was only one Assemblyman absent. There was not a single person present but what appreciated the gravity of the situation, and the nervous strain, even to one wholly disinterested, was intense. In the hands of seventy-nine men was the political, and social, and business future of a man, and he and his friends were making a desperate, and what at one moment looked like a hopeless fight against inevitable ruin. Finally, the roll-call, which would have sealed his fate, was interrupted; Assemblyman Burnett, pale and trembling, rose when his name was called, and said he would refuse to vote on such a matter, when so much was at stake, unless the Chief Clerk be given an opportunity to be heard. To be granted this privilege, it was necessary for the Assembly to give unanimous consent. Two members objected; the roll-call was about to be resumed, and a scene of confusion followed. Members rushed about the floor, and finally the objectors withdrew their opposition, and Duckworth, pale, trembling, but dramatic, took the floor. He said that the investigation had been unfair. He was guilty only of yielding to the demands of rapacious members. He had nothing to conceal, and would answer any questions. After much discussion, the roll-call was re-commenced, and Duckworth had won the day when Assemblyman Ruhell, after failing to get excused from voting, registered the fortieth vote against the resolution to dismiss the Chief Clerk. The vote was 44 yeas to 34 nays, Malcolm of Santa Clara going into hiding to escape being put on record. Nine Democrats out of the eleven in the San Francisco delegation and the seven Republicans voted to save Duckworth, Treacy and Lacy being the only ones in favor of the resolution to dismiss. Dennery, Bettman, and Jones made themselves the Chief Clerk's champions, and with Dibble's clever leadership saved Mr. Duckworth's bacon—so to speak.

What impelled the Democrats to vote for Duckworth was the fact that the Republicans refused to censure the mileage committee and others who requested appointees on the temporary roll, and tried to put all the blame on the Chief Clerk's shoulders. Duckworth is exonerated, but the disgrace of the scandal still sticks to the skirts of the Republican party, and is good, available campaign material.

It was amusing during the proceedings in the Duckworth matter, to hear all the distinguished law-makers who had sought to have friends appointed by the Chief Clerk, explain their motives. Dryden, of San Diego, who is always ready with a cutting remark, in commenting on the majority voting a preacher $5 for a three-minute prayer each day, said, that after listening to what members had said and what they had done, he thought a man who was brazen enough to ask the Lord's blessing on such a gang, was entitled to all he was paid.

Senator Braunhart is the author of several bills which reduce salaries and fees of the several San Francisco patronage offices. As a result, Sheriff Whelau, County Clerk Curry, and others, are here, instead of being at home attending to their duties. The Senator would be of more service to the taxpayers if he would refrain from introducing this sort of legislation, for he seems to be in a hopeless minority.

The County Government act was the principal measure considered during the week in the Senate. With but few amendments, it is similar to the present law.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate has under consideration a bill organizing the Medical Department of the National Guard into a Sanitary Corps, and appropriating $5,000 for its equipment. The corps is to be modeled after the present organization of the regular army, and is sure to greatly benefit our State Militia.

Assemblyman Harry I. Mulcrevy is a man of few words.

His allusion to the unpraiseworthy part the Republicans played in their conduct towards Chief Clerk Duckworth, made what is theatrically termed a "hit." He thought that after they had put Duckworth in a trying position, they ought to help him out of his predicament.

The San Francisco pilots are making a determined and, it is to be hoped, a successful fight against the measure proposed by Senator Gleaves, abolishing compulsory pilotage so far as American vessels are concerned. The responsibilities and the extraordinary abilities required of pilots, and the money they have invested, should be taken into consideration before a measure of this kind is passed. There are many captains coming to San Francisco who are not capable of bringing their vessels into harbor, and it is due to the experienced pilots of that port that so very few accidents and losses of vessels occur in the "roughest" of "rough weather." Coasting vessels do not now have to take a pilot, and compulsory pilotage is only enforced on vessels coming from foreign ports. A pilot at the very best has no sinecure. His fees are only commensurate with the work and responsibility placed on him, and it is difficult to figure how the mere matter of abolishing fees will increase the shipping business, if that is what the advocates of the bill are aiming at.

Labor Commissioner Fitzgerald is properly disgusted with the treatment accorded the measures proposed by him in the interest of labor. None of them have a chance to pass, as the Republicans in the Senate feel that too much political power would result to the Democrats by their adoption. The labor element won't "do a thing" to the shrewd Republicans next election.

What was published last week concerning the bill requiring a deposit by foreign marine insurance companies doing business in the State, has had a good effect. Many members who had rashly rushed to a favorable opinion of Senator Bert's bill, have experienced a change of mind. The idea of creating what would be a practical monopoly in the maritime insurance business does not find much favor here. The more the proposition is discussed, the smaller become the chances of effecting such unwise and unnecessary legislation.

Little things illustrate certain Englishmen's knowledge of American geography very picturesquely. An Englishman, who had taken the Pacific Express at Philadelphia, called out ou going to bed before the train started: "Portah! portah!" The porter came. "What is it sir?" he said. "Please wake me up when we get to San Francisco, you know," said the Englishman.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Household Economics.—"I don't see, Ella, how you manage with your house money. If I give you a lot, you spend a lot; but if I don't give you so much, you seem to get along with it." "Why, that's perfectly simple, Rudolph. When you give me a lot I use it to pay the debts I get into when you don't give me so much!"—Fliegende Blatter.

"Beg pardon, sir," observed the tough-looking waiter, suggestively, "gentlemen at this table usually—er—remember me, sir." "I don't wonder," said the customer, cordially; "that mug of yours would be hard to forget." And he picked up his hill and strolled leisurely in the direction of the cashier.—Tit-Bits.

Customer—Here, I've brought these glasses back; they're not strong enough. OPTICIAN—Indeed, sir! they're the strongest we keep. CUSTOMER—Well, they're not the slightest use to me. What had I hetter do? OPTICIAN—Well, sir, if I were you I should advertise for a dog.—Ally Sloper.

On the occasion of the Lord Mayor's visit to North Londou recently a captain was heard to remark to his corps: "Close up, boys; close up! If the enemy were to fire on you when you are stragglng along like that they wouldn't kill a single man of you. Close up!"—London Tit-Bits.

He—As our engagement is canceled, of course you will return that diamond ring? SBE—Mr. Styles, you said I was a peach the day when you gave me this ring. Well, if I am, I am a peach of the clingstone variety. Therefore, I'll keep the diamond.—Boston Transcript.

"Mrs. O'Rooney," said Rev. Father McMurphy, "why do I never see Patrick at church now?" Mrs. O'Rooney shook her head sadly. "Is it anarchism?" "Warse, your riverence." "What is it, then?" "Rheumatism."—Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.

They threw the broad mantle of charity over her. "This is too much," she faltered. There has been great changes in the modes since the mantle of charity was made, and there was indeed more of it than was absolutely necessary.—Detroit Journal.

Daughter (in tears)—Oh, papa, why did you throw Reggy down the front steps? FATHER—Why, you didn't think I was going to throw him up the front steps and into the house again, did you? You're as hard to satisfy as your mother.—Judge.

Nodd—Bilter must be a hardened wretch. I don't suppose the sight of any torture would make him quail. TODD—What makes you think so. He tells me he loves to see his wife hathe the hahy.—Life.

Each day his roses as surprises
Come. If he knew, the stupid thing,
That in two months at present prices

The Conjurer—Will some gentleman let me have a silver dollar? UNCLE JOSH (in disgust)—Oh, shucks, he's going to explain the money question!—Puck.

He—Don't you sing "The Maiden's Prayer?" SBE—Why, yes; that is why we had to move from the other flat.—Fliegende Blatter.

THE WINDY CORNER.

WE met beneath a summer sky,
But Phyllis coldly passed me by;
And fair was she, and mute was I
In love that could not scorn her,—
Not knowing we should meet one day
Beneath a sky of black and grey
And on a windy corner.

For dainty maid in dainty dress.
When pride is great and love is less,
Is slow to pity man's distress
And leaves him long to mourn her;
But grace is awkward in a squall
And even pride may have a fall
Upon a windy corner.

With garments wildly blown about,
Her silk umbrella inside out,
My lady's pride was put to rout,
No sight could he forlorner.
And she had fallen at my feet,
But swifter than the tempest beat
Upon that windy corner.

I flew to render joyous aid,
Then hinted to the troubled maid
That to my arms, through storm and shade,
A happy fate had borne her;
And evermore I lead my wife
Round all the varied turns of life
And every windy corner.

TO be quite liberal and truthful there is no Gotham gossip at present, excepting the talk about the Bradley-Martin's coming ball. It is becoming almost as much of a bore as the Castellane-Gould wedding was, although the papers have not liked the Bradley-Martiu boots quite so energetically as they did the foot-gear of the Castellanes and Goulds. Why these people should not be permitted to spend their money as they choose, without being made the topic of sensational sermons and editorials, is a mystery to all save the writers of these homilies. The matter makes one realize why so many Americans prefer a residence abroad. In England a man's house is his castle; in this country it is as far as the great American "people" can make it so—a public highway.

Following closely upon the bal costume, the arrival of Ivory, the alleged dynamiter, is the next point of interest. The Irish National Alliance, with the Sixty-ninth Regiment band—the famous "fighting 69th"—went down the bay to meet this celebrated gentleman. Many of his friends accompanied them, and so did the family of District Attorney McIntyre, who went over as special counsel for the Uptown Salouokeeper. No. 1, the notorious Tynan, who arrived only three months ago, was also on the chartered steamer which sailed forth in welcome, but he attracted little notice—and was in fact, quite out of it—I am told. The enthusiasts were obliged to spend the night at quarantine as the Majestic was very late. Another gentleman of renown who came over was the great Budd Doble.

May Irwin, who is a favorite in San Francisco, and everywhere else, for that matter, gave a novel entertainment yesterday. She took fifteen of her company to the Home for Colored People in First avenue, and sang for them her repertoire of darkey songs. There were three hundred inmates, ranging from the infant to the centenarian, and even the babies were delighted. After the performance, the darkeys themselves entertained Miss Irwin by singing for her. It was a kind act on Miss Irwin's part, was it not, to gratify those poor unfortunates?

The Charity Ball was the usual thing—patronized by the Four Hundred, and attended by the usual hundreds on the borders of society, and the other hundreds who are obliged to go in order to keep up its tone.

Society is in full swing, but even private functions do not lessen the interest in the opera. I saw there the other night the Wilsons and Carrolls, who have just arrived in their private car, and are at the Waldorf. Thinking of music, Mrs. Ruth Abbe was heard the other day at a musicale in the Waldorf, and made a succes d'estime. Miss Vidaver, daughter of Rabbi Vidaver of San Francisco, is, I am told, a singer of brilliant promise. Her voice is said to be superb. She is studying with Mrs. Bella Thomas Nichols, who, by the way, has been confined to the house almost constantly since November, suffering from acute rheumatism.

SAN FRANCISCO
NEWS LETTER
 California Advertiser.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 20, 1897.

Number 8.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54, Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 303 Boyce Building. (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

THE office of Recorder of San Francisco is not a paying institution. The salary list is too great for the receipts. Under the old order of things the office was more than self-sustaining, but the swelling pay-roll is a good $12,000 per year ahead of its receipts, when formerly it saved to the tax-payers twice that amount.

THE recommendation by a committee of the Board of Education that the contract for certain portions of the work on the new Mission High School be revoked, is abundantly justified. As we noted last week, there has been no end of scandal concerning that unfortunate venture; and it is time that a thorough investigation be made throughout.

THE unemployed of the city are for the first time in their history endeavoring to solve their present needs in a practical way. They are willing to raise vegetables, or undertake any other work that will yield a living. Mayor Phelan has taken an active interest in their troubles, and his efforts should find prompt indorsement. When the unemployed, who are not professional jaw-workers and agitators, want honest work, it is the first duty of the city to find something for them to do.

IT would be interesting to know how much time ex-Supervisor Wagner spends as "Inspector of Dependent Poor?" It would be interesting also to know by whose authority and upon what warrant he draws $100 per month from the taxpayers for that reputed service? Are there not already enough incompetent, lazy, bumming hangers-on about the City Hall? And is it necessary to pay Wagner $100 per month to sign a voucher for services he never performs? Great heavens, is it come to pass that when a Supervisor's official life is out, he cannot be officially killed!

THE Supervisors are asked by the State Board of Trade for a contribution of $2,500, to be expended in making a creditable exhibition of California products at the Hamburg and Guatemala Expositions. Just at this time, when California fruits are attracting the attention of German consumers, it is particularly desirable that an exhibit be made at Hamburg; and the extension of trade in Guatemala is equally desirable. The Expositions named will afford a rare opportunity for advertising in a practical manner the superior products of this State among the Guatemalans and in Germany. The expenditure is justified by the probable results.

THE Republican policy of reciprocity has never been of material benefit to American trade, and in some instances, if put in operation, would result in direct and great injury. We have a case in point in the proposed reciprocal arrangement permitting the introduction of French wines into California upon this basis. It is manifestly to the interest of our viticulturists that no such law be put into effect. The wine industry of California, until recently, at least, has been rather unfortunate. Now that organized effort among the growers has placed it on a paying basis, it is to be hoped that nothing will be done to cripple the industry. California wants nothing of reciprocity in wines with France.

THE effort that is being made at Sacramento to establish a free market on the water front in this city is commendable, as the conditions existing here at present favor the successful operation of such a system of distribution.

THE State Printer has closed up the print shop to everything but legislative work. No doubt, it is expected in this way to compel the Governor to capitulate. From the very clear showing made by Governor Budd in his veto of the printing bill last week, he was entirely justified in refusing to pour more money into that rat hole. The State printing establishment has been conducted in a recklessly extravagant manner, and in calling an abrupt halt the Governor has performed a plain duty.

MRS. Jane Lathrop Stanford has just added another to the already long list of fragrant reasons that entitle her to the affectionate remembrance of all true men and women, by the giving of her beautiful house on California street, in this city, to the cause of education. This noble woman, by her splendid benefactions, points the primrose path for wealthy age. It is only great wealth that can bring about the mighty works with which the names of Governor and Mrs. Stanford must always be lovingly associated, and which must lend hope and inspiration to every impulse for bettering and elevating mankind.

IT is not likely that ex-Supervisor King, who is just now telling the Grand Jury what he doesn't know about the frittering away of $10,000 of the people's money for repairs on the City and County Hospital during his term of office, will recollect anything worthy of the attention of that body. King has been in business for himself too long to have any troublesome remembrance as to the manner in which those thousands of dollars were generously apportioned among his friends, the contractors, who did the hospital work without the annoying interference of open or any other sort of honest competition.

WE note that Stockton's Council has made a heavy cut in water rates in that city, refusing to consider $500,000 bonds which the company desired to include in the appraisalment of its property, and making the reduction as if no such debt existed. Of course interest on those bonds must be met, or if default be made the water company may find itself in a serious predicament. If the money represented by those half-million of bonds has been used to make needed improvements, or increase the capacity of the Stockton Water Works Company, it looks as if their rejection was most unjust. We shall be surprised if the courts are not called upon to set the Stockton Council right.

THE action of the Supreme Court of this State last week in ordering a litigant to pay damages in the sum of $100 to a defendant because the action was vexatious and frivolous, comes as a rude shock to long established precedent, and a violent surprise to the average layman. This is the first record we recall of any action upon the part of the Supreme Court of California calculated to discourage the use of its sacred precincts as a refuge for the strong who find in a maze of vague and shadowy technicalities not only a means of grievous inflictions upon the innocent, but sometimes an ultimate defeat of right. If such just rebuke were administered to all those who deserve it in important cases as well as little ones, it would rob the Courts of half their terrors, and give homely justice a better chance to thrive.

BRAVO, LITTLE GREECE!

ALL honor to the brave, interesting, but little Kingdom of Greece for cutting the Gordian knot, known as "the European concert," and commanding the unspeakable Turk to take his hands from the throats of the Greek and Armenian Christians on the historically famous island of Crete. Ties of blood and religion, to say nothing of those of humanity at large, fully justify this action on the part of the Greek people; for it is their action. Weeks ago King George notified the powers that he would not be able to restrain his subjects from joining with the Cretans, and, at the same time, retain his throne. Things grew worse on the Island, the native population armed, fought the Turkish soldiery like demons, they battled for more than liberty in government: the lives of their wives and children were at stake, all Greece was aflame with passion, and now the too long delayed war with Turkey is fairly on. It could not have broken out at a better time, at a more advantageous point, for more substantial reasons, or with a combatant on the right side with more powerful friends. King George of Greece is the Czar of Russia's uncle, and brother of the Princess of Wales. Prince George, who is in charge of the expedition to Crete, is the hosom friend and was the travelling companion of Prince Nicholas, now the Czar, in a trip around the world, and bravely saved his life while in Japan. The Dowager Empress of Russia, the Czar's mother, is the daughter of the King of Denmark, and brother of King George, whilst the present Czarina is the granddaughter of Queen Victoria, whose second son is married to an aunt of Czar Nicholas. It will thus be seen that the three royal houses of Russia, England, and Denmark are so identified with the man whom the Greeks, more than 20 years ago, elected their King, that he cannot be driven to the wall, and least of all by "the sick man" of Europe. Blood, even though it be royal blood, is thicker than water. If the killing barbarously, treacherously, of men, women, and children of the Greek race be not cause for their brethren to rush to their assistance, then there can remain nothing to justify armed combat in this world. The Turk in the almost impassable fastnesses of Armenia or behind the forts of the Dardanelles is well nigh impregnable, whereas in the Mediterranean Isle, he is in about as tight a place as his enemies would like to have him. He knows this, however, and proposes to attack Greece on her Northern boundary, but even that is something easier said than done. To reach Thessaly, Macedonia has to be crossed, than which no section of Turkish territory contains so many well armed, and war-prepared Greek Christians, anxious to strike the final blow for freedom. Greece could hold her own there. It is now early spring in that region; the very best period of the year for warlike operations. We do not believe, however, that these many advantages have resulted from mere accident. There is design somewhere.

European politics are like a game of chess with the men moved by unseen hands. For weeks the London press hinted pretty clearly as to what was coming. It was seen that Europe would not agree upon action. Fears and jealousies of each other kept the Great Powers apart. They advised the Turk to reform, but would not strike a blow. They might as well have been whistling a jig to milestone. In this condition of affairs, the English press first, then the French, and lastly the German, began to agitate the idea of the lesser powers most interested, taking hold of that which the greater ones had feared to touch. A month ago the London Court Journal said:—"there is a most formidable army within his (the Turk's) own territory ready to swoop down upon him—an army of Greeks, Macedonians, Armenians and even of Mussulmen of many tribes, who are demanding liberty and willing to sacrifice all to secure it. Whilst the diplomats may dislike the oncoming of such a crisis in Turkish affairs, the statesmen of various countries would welcome it as the best thing that could happen in the interests of civilization. The Czar has said that he will not strike a blow against Turkey, but he has never said he will strike a blow for that country. He may soon have to choose between that and a most serious alternative." That, as we read it, was a plain indication of what was coming. It was a pretty accurate foretelling of the card that is now being played. What is to be the result? Either the long expected and much feared war, or the protection of Asiatic harbarity and slaughter by European civilization. War may be staved off for a time, but the latter alternative can never endure. The world cannot be made to turn backward. Greece may only get Crete and Macedonia now, but she will blaze the way the Turk will have to go—out of Europe.

The Nicaragua Bill Is Dead. The men in charge of the Nicaragua Canal scheme are responsible for its death.

It had merit, but their bill had none. It turned out in debate that no actual survey of the whole route had ever been made, that the estimate of cost was ridiculously below what the actual expense of construction would be, that the charter to the canal company had lapsed, and that if it had not, it provided that "no transfer to any Government should ever be made." Minister Rodriguez of Nicaragua had notified our Government of these two sections of the franchise, and of the intention of his Government to insist upon them. There remains, therefore, nothing to be done about building the canal until we can negotiate an undisputed title. It may be taken for granted that the United States, will not, at present at any rate, take possession by force. The Monroe Doctrine puts an estoppel on European powers acquiring further territory on this continent, but it confers no right upon us to seize what is not our own. Then the treaty we have with England, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, stands in the way of either of the high contracting parties constructing the Canal alone, should the other desire to join in the enterprise. Before beginning so costly an undertaking, we must be sure that we are right, and then we may well go ahead. It is clear that the diplomats have got to get to work over this question again, before anything can come of it. Senator Sherman, the coming Secretary of State, realized this when he said in debate that "the whole matter would have to be begun de novo." He suggested that it be "dropped until further negotiations should enable them to see where they stood." His suggestion was acted upon, and the bill, for the present, is dead. But sooner or later the Canal will be built. The commerce of the world has need of it. It would greatly benefit California, and bring the Eastern and Western shores of our vast country closer together.

Sixty Years A Queen. The British residents of San Francisco propose to follow the example of their fellow countrymen all over the world, by celebrating Queen Victoria's sixtieth year of reign with all possible eclat. Many loyal and patriotic Americans will join them, for we all have a soft side for the good woman and mother who in all the duties of life, and in all her relations towards her people has set so noble an example. Americans will not forget, and history will not fail to record, that in the darkest hour of our country's peril, it was this good Queen, in association with her estimable consort, who stretched the constitution of her country to the end that that of ours might be in less danger of being rent in twain. When her combative First Minister, Lord John Russell, arrived late and in haste at the Royal Castle, he carried with him the draft of a despatch to Secretary Seward, respecting the Trent affair, which involved our acceptance of either a deep humiliation, or the gage of battle. Had Victoria followed the usual constitutional practice, nothing would have remained for her to do but accept the advice of her constitutional minister and approve the proposed despatch. One of the many causes of her popularity with her people is her rigid compliance with that rule. To all ministries supported by the majority of the House of Commons she was alike given her confidence, and accepted their responsible advice. But for once she cast precedent to the winds and followed the promptings of her own heart. With the issue of peace or war between her people and ours hanging in the balance, she was unhesitatingly for peace. All night long she and Prince Albert worked at the despatch couched in acceptable terms and which subsequently led to the graceful and amicable adjustment that was reached. Thurlow Weed, some years later published the facts in his auto-biography, and no living reader of his story will fail to recall them at this time. For this act alone, if for no other, Americans respect the British Queen and will gladly join their cousins from across the sea, in rejoicing over her long useful and glorious reign. She has now been on the throne for a longer period than any of her many predecessors, and, perhaps, no higher tribute to her good qualities could be paid than that which her people evince when they so ardently desire that she may be spared to them for many years yet to come. To-day almost all the monarchs of Europe are bound to her by ties of blood and kinship. Her little kingdom with a population of less than 30,000,000, has grown into an enormous Empire, on which the sun never sets, and containing not fewer than 320,000,000 of people, or nearly one third of the inhabitants of the entire globe. Civilization has advanced as it never did before. One mile a minute steam carriers, Ocean greyhounds, news flashed around the world in the twinkling of an eye, the marvels of electricity, and the transference of the burdens of toil from man to the steam engine, are but a few of the many strange and wondrous things that have come to us since that day. The Victorian era will constitute the brightest of history's pages. All honor to the good woman who gives her name to it.

McKenna's Successor. The acceptance by Judge McKenna of a Cabinet portfolio in President-elect McKinley's official household at Washington, will make a vacancy on the bench of the United States Circuit Court of California. Already wires are being pulled, and both surface and underground influences being brought to bear by aspirants for the robe McKenna will doff after March 4th. There is no reasonable doubt that he will retain his seat on the bench until after the inauguration of Mr. McKinley, inasmuch as a Democratic successor would result if the appointment were to devolve upon President Cleveland. The position is in that sense a political one, and has for time out of mind been so regarded. We are always pleased to say that the Judiciary, at least, should be above politics; but here is an illustration of the error of that theory. However, the NEWS LETTER's purpose in reviewing this appointment is not for the purpose of protesting against this semi-political appointment, but to express the hope that the President-elect will make a selection from among those already trained in the practice and procedure of the United States Courts, as against those who are more familiar with practice in the State Courts. To apply a sort of civil service rule, the seat vacated by Judge McKeuna should be filled by a Judge from the United States District Court. It will not be denied for a moment that an appointment of this character would prove more satisfactory than if the appointee were made from the State Courts, or should fall to the political attorney who might happen to have a pull at Canton or Washington. Let the appointment fall upon the shoulders of a lawyer or a Judge who is known to be learned and at home in the practice of the United States Courts. Pilgrims with one eye on Judge McKenna and the other on McKinley are already headed Eastward. For the ability and strength of our Circuit Court, we hope that the successor of Judge McKeuna may be chosen for his legal attainments and acquaintance with the laws he will be called upon to interpret.

Inviting Immigration. Southern California possesses in a very great degree that prompt energy necessary to the accomplishment of any object of public utility that may be undertaken. The people beyond the notched Tehachapi believe in their resources, and they have a sublime faith in advertising what they have got, to the world. Southern California has grown because of the incessant and sleepless energy of those boomers, coupled with native resources that largely justify their enthusiastic endorsement. First, they hailed the unfortunate citizen of the East, who was blessed with but a single lung. As a sanitarium for all the afflicted was Southern California first advertised; and the land was filled with invalids and overrun with funerals. But the day of irrigation came, and with it the realization of what the true development of Southern California would mean. The widespread bubble of 1885, whose bursting brought havoc to thousands, also brought sober and practical sense with financial convalescence. People no longer sought to sell town lots, but they went diligently at work cutting up their lands, so that they might be attractive to the actual settler of moderate means. They advertised their wares throughout the country. Sometimes they overshot the mark, but they approved of the theory that it is better to tell a little too much than to tell nothing. The gratifying result is apparent on every side.

Last week, a meeting was held at the San Francisco Board of Trade for the purpose of stimulating immigration to Central and Northern California. And a very pertinent—our Southern friends will say impertinent—compliment was paid them in the determination to locate a bureau of information, to be kept open for several months, in Los Angeles, where the immigrant, who escapes the pursuit of the real estate agent, may learn of the desirability of a home in this part of the country. There exists much misinformation in the East as to the temperature and products of Central and Northern California which is not removed when the traveler reaches the southern part of the State. It is not generally known that among the earliest oranges shipped East from the Coast are those grown north of the Tehachapi mountains. It seems that facts of this sort are overlooked by the residents of Southern California, in their missionary efforts, or adroitly exchanged for icicles in January and droughts in June. In fact, General Warfield, at the Board of Trade meeting, declared that he had seen in Los Angeles, with his own unaided vision, numerous photographs of a Santa Rosa hotel, from whose eaves were depending icicles ten feet in length and as large as an elephant's trunk. These unique results of the painter's palette and photographer's art, were printed by the thousands and sent broadcast throughout the land. It is to overcome the icicle crop and similar exuberance peculiar to our buoyant Southern neighbors, and for other reasons, that the movement is taking shape.

A bureau of information, to keep prominently before the arrivals at Los Angeles the fact that not all the orange, and lemon, and lime-growing lands are confined to the country south, but that these and kindred fruits are grown in abundance in Central and even Northern California, would be productive of good results. The entire area open for agricultural and horticultural pursuits in this part of the State, should be classified as to price, locality, terms of payments, and special adaptability, and presented in simple and distinct manner. A bureau rightly conducted, embodying these features, even in Los Angeles, would be of value, for there is no doubt that many people reach Southern California without passing within our gates who, once placed in possession of reliable information of the opportunities awaiting them here, would be induced to visit this part of the State and build their homes in this section. Let us be generous; let us make haste to divide the approaching tenderfoot with our brethren of the south land.

Nevada's Disgrace. The Virginia City Enterprise takes deep offense at the strictures made by the NEWS LETTER upon the licensing of finish glove contests in the State of Nevada. It says that San Francisco stands in equal guilt, and that certain of the Police Department of this city were notoriously in the pay of Little Pete. The deplorable effects of the prize-ring are even already painfully apparent in the extravagant language of the Enterprise, which ends its attack with the following direful flourish: "As to striking Nevada from the roll of this glorious union, there will be excellent skating in Hades when it is accomplished." The Enterprise seeks to justify this direct sale of the State's honor by claiming that the moral conditions here are as bad as they are in Nevada. The NEWS LETTER is not defending San Francisco's fistic dishonors. We do maintain, however, that Nevada is the only State in the Union that is willing to make special legislation for the protection of these brutal exhibitions for pay: that Nevada's Governor is the first and only chief executive who has so far forgotten himself as to meet and welcome a slugger at the train, bid him welcome entrance to his borders, with evident pride review the training quarters of a bruiser, and joyously accept the notorious honor of his patronizing acquaintance. It will be in logical and graceful sequence for Governor Sadler to open the exercises on the 17th of March, and introduce the return of Nevada's protected industry in a neat and happy address. Sadler is a man of distinction now—in Nevada, and of notoriety elsewhere: his is the hand that shook Corbett's.

Quack Face Doctors. Since the days when Eve sauntered through the Garden of Eden, gowned in fig leaves, all womankind have vainly sought for some magician's wand to wave off the crowding years, and shield their cheeks from Time's tell-tale calendar. Everything that ingenuity and trained skill could do to keep away the evil days of old age—to preserve the freshness and bloom of youth, has been done, and we have reached a period when art so cunningly counterfeits nature that the faces of the aged spinster and the withered dame may for a time, at least, mock the passing years. But to become so skilled that this may be safely done, requires a proficiency and a knowledge of dermatology that is exceedingly rare and valuable.

In answer to so general a demand, and without the least knowledge of the business, there have risen hordes of alleged face doctors, dermatologists, beauty renewers, and kind Heaven knows what not. These quacks are for the most part densely ignorant, not only of their advertised business, but of all other things, earthly; and they are as unscrupulous as they are ignorant. Their cards may be seen in fifty places about this city, and they ply their dangerous trade with impunity. They should be shunned by every woman who desires to escape serious despoilment, to say nothing of the preservation of whatever personal charms she may possess.

Several cases have just occurred, wherein women who have gone to these female charlatans, for the purpose of having the skin on their faces renewed, have received such savage treatment as sent them post-haste and dangerously injured to their family physicians for relief. In one recent particular case, the patient's face wore a monstrously grotesque appearance after an encounter with one of these beautifiers. Every feature was badly swollen, the cheeks, lips, forehead, and nose looked as if they had been literally broiled; and the eyesight was temporarily destroyed. This resulted from an effort to remove the old cuticle and produce a new and baby-like growth. Many times the cosmetics, nostrums, and lotions used, as in the above case, are of the most powerful character, and their application inflicts great pain and lasting injury, if not actual disfigurement.

Since woman, lovely woman, is bound to be beautiful—and who shall say her nay?—it is just, and certainly it is necessary, that she be protected in her search and its achievement. We compel physicians, and surgeons, and druggists, to meet certain requirements; to know, practically, certain things, before they are allowed to do business. Why shall the beauty doctor, the wrinkle-destroyer, the cuticle remover and renewer—the whole gamut of face tinkers and tricksters—not be compelled to qualify themselves for their work? Allow them to practice only upon a diploma, which must be displayed in their reception rooms and offices. There should be a law compelling a thorough qualification for their business, and a heavy penalty for its violation. Such a provision would afford at least some degree of protection to those who feel that nature has not been lavish in bestowal of personal charms upon them, and who, by this doubtful path, desire to make up the measure of their ideals.

Walter Besant On the Slavery Of Husbands Walter Besant, who was but lately knighted by Queen Victoria for his services to literature, has recently been addressing, in a most kind and feeling spirit, certain very searching considerations to the woman of the period. He had just been reading a woman's book advocating increased facilities for divorce. It is a subject in regard to which he naively says he "has no views, because as it is never likely to concern him, or his, or anybody worthy of his notice, he takes no interest in it," but he seriously objects to leading wives to believe that they alone are slaves, or that their lives are necessarily harder than those of husbands. The masses of both men and women are born without silver spoons in their mouths, as it were, and they both alike are necessitated to work. Marriage offers to most girls the kind of work that is most pleasing to them, and far more to their choice than domestic service, teaching, room renting, or even the higher occupations for which only a small percentage of women are fitted. Ask the first candid girl you meet, says Sir Walter Besant, whether she would rather marry, and become the helpmeet, the confidant, the administrator of, perhaps, her own little fortune and of her husband's earnings, or whether she would prefer the comparatively exalted position of teacher, or postoffice clerk, or journalist, or typewriter. You know perfectly well—you who talk so glibly about the wife being a slave—what her answer will be. If you insist in calling her choice "slavery" you may, but good wives do not talk that way. They bear, and forbear, and, when they talk at all upon the subject, it is with hearts overflowing with affection for the man who honored them with the name of wife. If she is a slave, so is her husband. He goeth forth to his slavery daily, and often with unstrung nerves and weary brain, fights, struggles, and not seldom loses in the battle of life. Even though very successful Walter Besant says of himself: "I actually, slave as I am, sit down every morning, without any resentment or repining, to my slavery. I must work, else who will pay the baker and the grocer? I must work, and so besotted am I (from the woman-of-the-period's point of view) that I really work as if I enjoyed it, and I do, but mostly because of the little woman at home." In all conditions of life there are troubles to bear. They are not lessened, but rather increased a thousand fold by easy divorce. Marriage may not be made in heaven, but, if lived up to, it is sanctified there. Nature and Nature's God have alike constituted it the highest form of human happiness, and only vile hearts and bad laws are rendering it otherwise.

Our Suggestions Approved. The other day Chief Justice Beatty, and other legal lights, appeared before the judiciary committees of the Legislature, and adopted the suggestions heretofore made by the NEWS LETTER for enlarging the capacity of the Supreme Court for dealing with its calendar. The plan was approved and will likely be submitted to popular vote as an amendment to the constitution. It involves nothing more than adding three more judges to the Bench, and the creation of a third department. This would increase the working power of the Court one third, and about keep pace with the number of cases that at present go up on appeal. As this change cannot be effected for two years, it was of course necessary to continue the Court Commissioners in office for that period. This plan is simple, easily effected, and the only practicable one yet suggested. The Examiner keeps on demanding, as a reform, the creation of three intermediate Courts of appeal, but the why of the proposal is understood, and meets only with contempt. It is easier to delude the crowd than a judiciary committee. The next thing to do is to reduce litigation to a minimum in the safe, just and equitable way the NEWS LETTER has heretofore pointed out. Two rules of practice (1) the loser to pay the winner's costs in full, and (2) no lawyer's fees contingent on the result, would soon curtail the present terrible volume of litigation, cure the congestion of the Courts, and leave us a happier and better people.

The Board Of Election Commissioners. The gentlemen who at present constitute the Board of Election Commissioners have had the good taste to ask to be relieved of offices which they think, and rightly so, ought never to have been committed to their care. The Mayor, Auditor, tax collector, and surveyor are ex-officio the Commissioners whose duty it is to give us honest registration; faithful election officers, and true counts. For many good and substantial reasons that have been only too amply demonstrated by experience, it has long been clear that no such duties ought to be imposed upon the officials named. If they give four or five months close attention to the onerous work of preparing for and conducting an election, they must necessarily during that time neglect their other duties. Again, as they are frequently candidates for re-election, the unseemly sight is presented of men in office being interested in going wrong in their own behalf. The system has been only too fully condemned by its own bad results. The arrangements have been defective, many of the election officers inefficient, if not worse, and the counts have proven again and again strangely mixed and erroneous. Elections should be conducted in a manner above reproach, and the sooner means are employed to that end the better.

THE ART EPICUREAN.

(FOURTH PAPER)

AGAIN let us turn to Lord Lytton to help point a moral and adorn a tale—

"But if, out of humor, and hungry, alone,
A man should sit down to a dinner, each one
Of the dishes of which the cook chooses to spoil
With a horrible mixture of garlic and oil,
The chances are ten against one, I must own,
He gets up as ill-tempered as when he sat down."

And how man does love his interior decoration! Where is his soul compared to his stomach? But that's the man of it, I suppose. He prefers a tangible present to an intangible future. He is a very prosaic creature, and if "out of humor, and hungry, alone"—look out for a squall, for nothing will suit; which leads up to the remark, did you ever see Frank—oh, well, identity is of no consequence—a certain mercantile gentleman whose offices are on California street, on his way to luncheon? It was my fortune to meet him the other day, with polka-dot De Joinville three sheets to the wind, rounding the corner, just as I was on my way to beard the Douglas in his halls. Now, had he been on his way from luncheon this tale might have had a more blissful ending, that is, if he is the average man, and I don't know of any reason why he should be called under the average—do you? As it was, I felt so crushed at his breezy refusal to divulge those ideas gustatory, a wealth of which are supposed to lurk under his blonde pate, that I almost dropped into the apologetic, but saved myself, and covered my retreat from the enemy's field by murmuring, sotto voce:

"Oh, Mistah Johnsing, don't be rude—
Oh, Mistah Johnsing, I'll be good."

And I vow that the frisky Ferris, "way up dar in de niggah heaven," didn't have the ghost of incentive that I had for rendering it con expressione. By the way, Hartman might well plead guilty to the soft impeachment, these days, of being called a man of the world—don't you think? Or don't you think? Some save wear and tear by not thinking. For instance, the imaginative writer on one of the Sunday supplement papers saves lots of brain tissue when he appends the idea, extremely original it must be confessed, to a quick-service write up, that costly dinners, at five dollars per capita (he would say "a bead") are a possibility in the near future by means of the nickel-in-the-slot machine upon which he dilates.

Can't you imagine a man with the tastes necessary to the enjoyment of a five-dollar dinner, poking his dollars and balves and quarters into numerous labeled apertures, and grasping with both eager hands the edibles shoved down, or up, or out to him—it's a mystery from which direction they do come. When a man sits down to a sumptuous dinner he isn't looking at his watch with one hand while he daintily carves crescents out of a piece of pie held in the other. He considers list-slipped waiters, shaded lights, glittering silver and crystal, satiny damask, almost as indispensable as the viands themselves.

A clever man recently said that San Francisco's coat-of-arms ought to be a knife and fork and spoon, and the motto on her seal, "Three for a quarter." That speaks volumes. We are a city of poor restaurant victims, and it seems to be the casual observer that the populace are always and forever dining—not in cosy homes, but in "three for a quarter restaurants."

But this isn't telling you about a delightfully old-fashioned dish served to an octet of friends, members of the Old Union Club in years ago, before the Pacific and Union joined forces. But first a word about the eight old friends who invariably dined together years and years ago, their ranks now sadly depleted by the unstaying hand of Death.

There were Cutler McAllister, brother of Hall McAllister; Eugene Dewey, whom all old San Franciscans remember—be died some time ago in New York; his brother William P. Dewey; Harry H. Veuve, the life of the party, who still resides in this city and is about the only one left of the merry eight, William Murray, Ben Smith, Alfred Goddefroy—does not his name bring up reminiscences?—and Tom Edmundson, him yeleft the "Irish lord" because of that air of gentlemanly munificence and bland assurance that never deserted him even when his exchequer contained nothing but its lining—a ease of "nothing in it but the binding round it," as it were. Every Friday these dimers would proceed with proper dignity to the concoction of their particular dish—a salmagundi of codfish. A regular "down east" dish. Each one had some ingredient to prepare. One shredded the fish, a second beat the potatoes into a mountain of snow; a third cut the hard boiled eggs in artistic forms for gracing the completed piece de resistance. A fourth had the savory duty of adding the boiled onions, and the fifth cut the boiled beets into tiny cubes. Others assisted at the sacred rites of dressing the concoction with a salad dressing of oil, vinegar, pepper, salt and mustard. Then the melange was borne with due pomp and ceremony to the kitchen, there to be warmed and have crisp pork "crackles" and green peppers put the finishing touch to the salmagundi. That it was eaten with a gusto is a foregone conclusion, for more than one reason. You see, everybody having a "finger in the pie," of course it behooved every one to praise it and pay it the compliment of speedy demolition; but it must have had some sterling qualities to have been their Friday dinner for so long a time. The fertile brain of man could easily have invented some excuse for varying the menu on some pretext or other, had it not been a success.

Poor Tom Edmundson, the Irish lord, is pretty nearly on his uppers now, I hear, living in New York city, one of the mammoth army of penniless "has beens." They say his princely airs are as evident to-day as when he was a member of the ultra-select Union Club.

Speaking of clubs, that is quite an idea lately to have little suppers, given by members after the theatre to their lady guests. One fortunate woman confided to me that she never in her life tasted anything to begin to compare with the Welsh rarebit she had one night at the Bohemian Club. She said the only thing that marred her perfect enjoyment of it was her consuming desire to go into the kitchen and find out exactly how it was made. But what would have been the use? A Welsh rarebit does not come at beck and call, and I very much doubt if my lady, just by wishing, could have made one like unto the Bohemian dainty, even with forty "receipts."

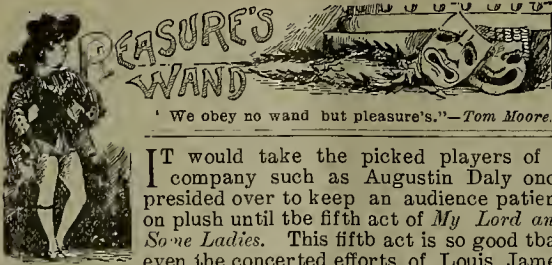

Did you hear about that breakfast that was given to James J. Corbett the other morning? But you didn't, because, wonder of wonders, none of the daily papers breathed a word about it. With such a dearth of news in town, it passes my puny comprehension how the thing was kept from the sleuths of the press. Aha! Perhaps they were invited to be "among those present," and in return for hospitality had the grace to accede to their host's wishes that it should not become public.

There was one particular article on the menu which I had the good luck to gather into my budget of recipes, one which Corbett particularly relished, so if you wish to be Corbettesque try these stuffed eggs, only be warned in time that they are not for a thin pocket-book, as the delicacies entering into their composition are all expensive.

Served hot, these are suitable for a luncheon or breakfast, but not for a dinner unless used as a cold salad with lettuce. Of course the foundation is hard-boiled eggs, the yolk carefully removed and chopped very fine. Combine with this pate de foie gras. Make a roux (browned flour and butter), lay in this a plentiful quota of Eastern oysters, and their simmering will make enough juice to thin the sauce sufficiently, with the addition of half a pint of cream added just before serving. Dip the filled whites of the eggs into raw egg, roll in bread crumbs, and fry quickly. Add seasoning to the roux in making the oyster sauce, of green onions and chopped herbs—just a pinch. A generous tablespoonful of the best butter goes in next, and then the oysters are put in and allowed to simmer and bubble. The sauce must be poured over the eggs hot, and the dish served immediately.

A correspondent signing himself "A Ci-Devant Bon Vivant," asks for a detailed recipe for the chicken à la Castilian mentioned in the menu of the Phelan inaugural dinner, and in my next paper I shall take pleasure in granting the request, not yet having all the data needed, which will be obtained from a certain Spanish cook who makes the dish to perfection. A Southern delicacy is also on the list for next time—something out of the ordinary, that is vouched for by Richard Porter Ashe and Hugo Toland, so beside these authorities what more could I say?

AMY L. WELLS.

It would take the picked players of a company such as Augustin Daly once presided over to keep an audience patient on plush until the fifth act of My Lord and Some Ladies. This fifth act is so good that even the concerted efforts of Louis James and four assistants cannot conceal its excellence. If there is any merit in the preceding four, it was indiscernible at Monday's performance. The night was a long one. An extravagant old party seated in a box pelted about sixty bunches of California violets at the red wig of the Duchess of Marlborough, and furnished some distraction that was not on the bill. But his aim was hopelessly bad; he was continually biting Mr. James on the legs, which was no great feat, since Mr. James wore his prancing comedy legs, and they were in all places at all times.

My Lord and Some Ladies, beyond the misadventures of Mr. James's production, is a conspicuously bare comedy. It was intended, no doubt, to be graceful tableaux—it achieves nothing more than slow anecdote in costume. I can find much better fun in the musty volumes of George W. Reynolds, the Mister Laura Jean of historical romance. This play gives us Queen Anne, and Bolingbrooke, and Sarah Jennings, together with a virtuous maid (who is a poor and obscure relation of Sarah's and therefore heroically despised by that wily duchess) and a virtuous young officer (quite as pure, and very like unto Fielding's Joseph Andrews). This chaste officer is really the hero of the play. Of course, Bolingbrooke has large intervals of the center of the stage, and he duels with the Duchess and hypnotizes the easy Queen, and upholds the dignity of the press of that period, and says several things that are famous and many more that are not, but the other is le man. His name is Farror—Sir George Farror—and it is inferred that he has great attractions for the sex. It seems unbelievable, but it is true, nevertheless. Sarah's little relative loves him with the worst kind of gum-drop adoration; the queen yearns for him in that warm, indolent way that queens have; and Sarah is after him with a passion that is simply scandalous—it transcends the fury of her rich red hair and reputation. But, pab! what does he care for a mushy queen or a lascivious duchess! He does not even know that they burn and fret for his pale young soul, he is so busy with his own little love for the poor but virtuous relation. So the worst does not happen. The last curtain goes down on the queen outwitted, Sarah snubbed, Bolingbrooke triumphant, and Arthur as pure and unsullied as the editor of The Ladies' Home Journal. Young men need not blush to take their fathers to see this play.

It is true that I have not told all that happens in the five acts—and I expect to be thanked accordingly. I see little possibility of being entertaining myself when the author and actors have each had such a hapless time. If I am not badly mistaken My Lord and Some Ladies was adapted by no less person than Theodore Kraemer, whom you may remember as the erotic author-actor-manager, who, at the Bush-street Theatre some years ago, reduced Suderman's Magda to cheap obscenity under title of The Church and the Stage. Mr. Kraemer has kept well within the law this time, but doubtless he had ideas of his own as to how a French comedy of manners should be done into English, just as Mr. James and his co-actors have ideas of their own about comedy in general and court etiquette in particular. It is not narrated of good Queen Anne that she was a stickler for ceremony and fine manners. She did not go to the Royal Bed with her crown on, but if that noble jollier, Bolingbrooke, had entered her apartments with any of the several manners that distinguished Mr. James at the Baldwin Theatre Monday night, she would have made allowances for the personal esteem in which she held him, and then demanded his head upon the spot. You will say it is irreverent and unworthy of me—but all the time Mr. James was on the stage I was comparing him with Swinnerton's impertinent caricatures of the Honorable Samuel M. Shortbridge. And I thought how much worse Swinnerton might have been. Mr. James is an excellent Othello, his Hamlet commands anybody's respect, and he is a good actor generally, but his Bolingbrooke is a crusher for a critic's dignity. The man who can write a serious criticism of it is not of this earth—or at least he should not be.

Speaking of things which are not of this earth, there is Mr. Lindsley, the young man who plays Arthur with the voice of mighty waters and the heart of ten women. There are some things which exceed this poor shape of mortal clay, and of them Lindsley is the largest. If life were built up to the size of Lindsley's acting, noses would be as big as the Call building. There was no character, or even plausibility in any of the acting. Miss Kruger, a clever young actress, who promised great things a year ago, played Queen Anne à la boarding school theatrical orgie; Miss Everett's Duchess of Marlborough was possibly worse on the same lines. Miss Aphie Hendricks, as the relation, was the best of the three—but it was a plain, unbrilliant best.

"They shouted, 'sit down in front!'"—said Charles Wayne during his recent engagement at the Orpheum, and with a fleet touch of pantomime he suggested what happened when he tried. The three coqueting Pantzers make no bones of the feat at all [joke]. I find that a Pantzer can set its brow towards any given mark and sit to the east, west, north or south with equal facility, and at the same time make a necklace of its legs and—well I forget what becomes of its arms, I suppose they go where the legs ought to be. I see but one objection to this act: it is when the male Pantzer finds the expression of his humor in wiggling an anatomical feature which usually remains inactive in polite society.

The Pantzers' act is only one out of five new ones at the Orpheum. For me the singing is the best of all. Guille's and Abramoff's solo work is in every way superior to that of the men who assisted Nordica in her concerts at the Baldwin, and the Rigoletto quartette is sung with a surety and enthusiasm which no one can accuse the Nordica singers of having voiced in the same selection. Hayes, Lytton and Hayes make a very poor showing in their comedy skit. A French Marriage is an American brutalization of a famous little French comedy out of which the players make a soggy, vulgar performance. The Renfos do some risky work on apparatus suspended from the roof, but the picture effect is marred by the substitution of sailor costume for silk tights. I did not time Mr. Finney's record-breaking autobiographical address, but my watch marked three minutes, to the second, for his longest stay under water.

I cannot understand why the children's Cinderella spectacle at the California Theatre has been so badly slighted. I looked in Tuesday night, expecting to find a big house, as that was the Chronicle's charity performance. There were not thirty people down stairs, including the orchestra. Which reminds me that the children shone like stars, and sounded like seraphim beside the adult execrability of this same orchestra. Little Miss Daisy Grogan simpered a dainty little ditty, which ran something like this:

Sweet little Rosey Posey,
All in your Sunday closey,
Goodness only knowey
I love you!

And still littler Miss Ruth Rowland (she can't be more than four) sang "What Could the Poor Girl Do?" in a most worldly and meaningful way. If the show lives its five acts up to the first, it is too good to miss.

Thursday afternoon Gustav Hinrichs sounded the metal of his musicians. The symphony orchestra is splendidly banded, and the second symphony concert is a credit to the town. The programme was a masterpiece of tact. There was Krug's love story suite, a perfect cameo of sentiment, which the strings brought out with dainty lyric tenderness; and Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsodie, a dinky little Spanish waltz, twisted and flowered and fire-cracked and tin-canned into an absolute carnival of dissipated French fun—these were for everybody, short hair and long. Then there was Goldmark's big Sakuntala overture, a tonal poem in a modest way, which the orchestra depicted with huge color and spring. And there was the Beethoven symphony—the second. To my thinking, Hinrichs is a genuine modern and an imitation classicalist. He is not bold enough to carry the innovating hand into the scores of ancient greatness—which is often a good thing and always a safe thing. So Hinrichs did not lift the larghetto above its usual tediousness—he took it in chaste, metronomic tempo, without a tinge of color or any other folly which an enterprising and very young director might infuse into the movement and startle an audience into enthusiasm. No one can cavil at the other movements; they do not suffer for virtuosity, and Hinrichs handled them with admirable conservatism.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Besides his record as the most popular march composer and bandmaster in America, John Philip Sousa comes to us this season with the additional distinction of having written a successful comic opera—El Capitan. Sousa and his men and his medals appear at the California Theatre on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday next. The band is said to have attained even greater perfection than before, and the repertory huddles with good things, new and old.

There will be a big double bill at the Tivoli next week—Gilbert & Sullivan's famous satire on aestheticism, Patience, and Von Suppe's mythological one-act operetta, The Lovely Galatea. Hartman, West, Raffael, Thomas, the Misses Seabrooke, Holmes, Schmahel, Mulle—in fact, all the trusty Tivoli company will be displayed in the two casts. A production of The Merry Wives of Windsor is in preparation.

There is room for hut one new act on next week's Orpheum bill, and that will be Barney Fagin and Henrietta Byron in a one-act comedietta. Fagin is the author of many popular eoon songs—among others, "My Girl's a High-Born Lady." Edmund Hayes and Emily Lytton have forsworn A French Marriage, and will continue their new burlesque, Camille Up to Date.

Fanny Rice is always a favorite in San Francisco, and from all the accounts of her new operatic farce, At the French Ball, the Columbia will have another prosperous fortnight. George Broderick, Charles Drew, John S. Terry, Alice and Frances Gaillard, Beekie Haight, and Kate Michelena, are of the company.

On Monday night we will know all about Shore Acres. This is the play that William Dean Howells applauded to the length of columns in Harper's Weekly. Both the play and the actor (James A. Herne) have won a big reputation in the East. The story deals with village life on the coast of Maine.

The Verein Eintracht will give a grand prize masquerade ball this Saturday evening at the Mechanics' Pavilion. Everything possible has been done to make this hall a great success, and it is expected that more than three hundred and fifty costumed people will appear in the grand march.

On Saturday, February 27th, Miss Fannie Rice will auction the boxes at the California Theatre at 11 A. M. for the play of Caste, to be produced at that theatre on Monday evening, March 1st, for the benefit of Children's Hospital and Armitage Orphanage.

Manager Gottloh returned from New Orleans on Thursday, buoyant with the prospects of the opera season at the California.

Our Little Cinderella continues at the California until Wednesday night, with an extra matinee on Washington's Birthday.

AN amateur benefit performance in aid of Armitage Orphanage and Children's Hospital, will be given at the California Theatre on the evening of Monday, March 1st, at which time Caste will be presented. The orphanage and hospital are most worthy of aid, and the California should be crowded with their friends on that occasion. Tickets will be $1—to be had at the box-office of the theatre February 26th, 27th, and on March 1st.

Don't fail to attend the 20 per cent. reduction sale now going on at S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary street. It will last only a short time longer.

AN important case has just been decided by Judge A. Smith of the Superior Court at Santa Cruz. The action was brought by a Mr. Struve against the Western Sugar Company for $20,000 damages, resulting, he alleged, from the dumping of quantities of sugar beet pulp on his land. The court allowed the plaintiff every possible latitude in the matter of witnesses, and the introduction of testimony, for the principles involved were of much importance to the beet sugar industry and the State. The defense was conducted by Mr. S. M. Shortridge, who made a brilliant summing up of the evidence. His presentation of the facts, and his convincing logic, won for the Western Sugar Company a verdict, the court ordering a non-suit in the ease.

THE BACHTNORS' BABY

FOR twenty years Jean Vignol had written special stories for popular papers; romances in which assassinations and exchanged infants figured conspicuously. He was really the equal of any of his competitors in this specialty. If you ever have a dangerous illness—from which God preserve you—and if you do not know how to fill the hours of a tedious convalescence, read "The Mysteries of Menilmontant," which has not less than twenty thousand lines. You will find in it all the usual ingredients from this literary cuisine.

The opening is striking, especially when the rascally Duke de Vieux-Donjon, at the close of the Opera, descends into the sewer where he has an appointment with an escaped convict, who is to deliver to him papers capable of ruining the beautiful Marquise des Deux-Poivrières, who, having been exchanged in infancy, is not the daughter of a Spanish Grandee as is supposed in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, but in reality that of a cabinet-maker condemned to death by a legal error, and guillotined in place of the convict with whom the Duke is keeping his subterranean appointment.

You see from this single example that Jean Vignol knew his trade perfectly.

Still the poor scribbler had only moderate success; he was not able to place his "copy" very readily, and he earned a very scanty living indeed. In the first place he lacked opportunity; and he was too modest to elbow his way after the fashion of Americans.

He had not made his debut in the literary world by writing serials. He preserved in the bottom of a drawer, without hope of ever having them anywhere else, his two youthful efforts, composed in the years when his locks were thick, and when he was full of faith in his art.

One was a volume of elegies, "Fleurs de Poison," in which the author bemoans the infidelity of a young person whom he designates by the name of Fragoletta, and compares to all the celebrated heroines of love tales from the most ancient times down to the present, while in reality the inconstant damsel, who was a florist's errand-girl, was named Agatha. The other work, more voluminous, was a horrible drama of the time of the Middle Ages, bearing the gory title "Les Ecorcheurs," whose characters were eternally slashing each other with swords, or else delivering endless tirades.

Unfortunately dramas are not edible, and the "Fleurs de Poison" could not be used to season salads. Their author was compelled to live at Belleville in small rooms on the fifth floor, with his mother, who was crippled with rheumatism and who complained from morning until night. To earn some money, the poet became a novelist, just as an unsuccessful painter becomes a photographer. He accepted his vocation with calm resignation and put forth all his efforts; still as we have said, his success was slight. This was but right after all, for his works lacked sincerity. One felt that he did not believe in his marquises whose fathers were guillotined cabinet-makers, and in his dukes who walked about in the sewers in fur overcoats and white neckties.

The manager of the "Petit Proletaire," in which Jean Vignol published his productions, said to him bluntly:

"My dear fellow, your readers feel that you are not sincere is what you write," so he paid him only two sous per line.

The poor man who felt that he was superior to his work, often drew a long sigh. But what could he do? It was his fate, so to keep his pot-au-feu boiling, he used his wits to invent more and more extravagant adventures.

Once, for example, not having paid his rent for two months, he would certainly have been evicted if he had not been able at the last moment, to obtain an advance payment from his publisher, who was seduced by the title of a romance of which these were the opening lines: "A musician who unbeknown to himself was the natural son of an English peer, returning home one night after the play, found a corpse in his 'cello case,'" "To be continued in our next," followed.

While his mother was alive, Jean, being the model of filial piety, found life endurable. But for two years he had been alone in the world, with no kindred, no friends, and the habits of a recluse. He felt really desolate in his fifth story room at Belleville. At the time of our narrative he was an undersized man of forty-seven, with a tendency to stoutness, a long black beard, a Socratic nose, and eyes like a kind dog. Having indifferent health and a stomach of the second class, he had been obliged to renounce the consolations of tobacco, except in moderation.

"What a nuisance," he said to himself one winter evening, as he ascended his five flights, for he was growing asthmatic. "The Journal finds that my last story, 'Mazas & Co.,' lacks bloodshed. I shall have to resuscitate Bouffe-Toujours, my convict, whom I precipitated from the Eiffel tower a short time ago, and to furnish him victims. And even after that, I know they will refuse me twenty centimes a line. What a dog's life!"

On entering his apartment he made several disagreeable discoveries. After a melancholy glance at his rack of pipes, he found that his coke fire which he had covered with ashes before leaving was entirely out. He would have to smut his hands to rekindle it. Then his lamp had been badly trimmed in the morning; he was obliged to change the wick; then he noticed that there were just two matches in the box.

"Tonnerre de brindezingue!" he exclaimed, that being his favorite oath. "I have to pass the night resurrecting that convict! And five flights to go down and up again just for a few matches. Ah, but no: I will borrow from my neighbor."

The neighbor was Mère Mathieu, a poor old woman whose daughter, abandoned by her husband, had died in childbirth in the month of July. The baby was now six months old, and the grandmother was bringing it up. There was enough poverty there, too. The novelist, prompted by a kind heart often went in and left money, when he had not enough for himself.

"Good evening, Mère Mathieu; will you lend me a few matches?"

Then he stopped in astonishment on the threshold. The old woman was kneeling on the floor and tying up her only mattress by the light of a piece of candle. The babe was asleep in a willow cradle, and on the cheap redwood bed there was nothing but a straw tick.

"What are you doing there, Mère Mathieu?"

"You can see, Monsieur Vignol," replied the old woman, ready to cry. "I'm going to carry this to the pawnshop, and I must hurry for it shuts up at eight. They ought to give me ten francs for it; it is good wool."

"What! your only mattress?"

"I must do it. My youngest sister, a widow like myself, has just been taken to her bed, and they don't want her at the hospital because her disease is chronic. I must help her a little, she has been so good to me. I shall sleep on the straw only a little while. It won't kill me. I hope to redeem my mattress when I get pay for my sewing. What bothers me now is the young one. It will take me at least an hour to go to the shop and to my sister's. Generally I leave it with the concierge, who is a good woman, but to-night they are to have a family gathering in the lodge. What shall I do with the baby?"

Long live the poor. Jean Vignol had tears in his eyes.

"Not that, Mère Mathieu. Leave your bed. I have fifteen francs. Here are ten of them. Run to your sister's. As for the babe, well, you may carry it into my room. It sleeps soundly, it won't keep me from working. And if it tunes up, why it won't be any trouble to give it something to eat.

"Ah, my good, kind Monsieur Vignol!" said the old woman as she put the cradle beside the novelist's table. Mère Mathieu went away murmuring benedictions. When alone with the babe, the writer laughed behind his great beard.

"Well, here I am, in the capacity of dry nurse!"

Stimulated by his kind act, he sat down by his lamp and took his pen. For he must have his pages at the office by morning. The romance would be entirely changed by the resurrection of Bouffe-Toujours. But this evening our romancer was in condition to do it. His convict, hurled from the second platform of the Eiffel tower by an elegant scamp, a Viscount descended from the crusades and a member of the Jockey Club, caught an iron bar in his fall and sprung to the quay with the agility of an orangutang. The next day he would poniard two or three policemen. The subscribers would have their full of emotion now.

Suddenly the little one began to fret. Amused by his new functions, Jean took the nursing-bottle and gave it to the child; not very awkwardly either for a beginner. Then he rocked it to sleep again.

The romancer did not return to his table. He sat by the cradle, and pensively looked at the little being lying on the pillow, with its tender fists clinched on its breast.

Cradles! Babies! Jean had indeed made free use of them in his absurd romances. But how stupid seemed all the improbable stories of stolen and exchanged infants. A child! Here was one; a real one, an orphan, a child of misery. What would become of it? Its grandmother was old, and broken down by labor and privations. She would not last long. Then it would be one of those little unfortunates which the public institutions bring up by thousands, and which nearly always turn out badly. It is from their ranks that thieves and convicts are recruited, real ones, this time. This poor little waif! What would life hold for it? Life? A mysterious romance, which becomes more incomprehensible at each page, and whose monotonous denouement explains nothing!

Jean Vignol fell into a dolorous reverie. The poet he had dreamt of being when he was young, was not all dead within him. Here was a child physically and morally abandoned, a child dedicated by a sort of social fatality to vice and crime; that should be the central figure of a book, in which he would express all the charity, all the tenderness, all the indignation of his heart. That was the romance which Jean Vignol ought to write. . . . But what was he thinking of? Jean Vignol had no talent, never had any, and he knew it well. If tears stifled him at this moment, he wept over both the misfortune of this poor child and his own impuissance.

The door opened. It was Mère Mathieu who had returned out of breath.

How tired she looked, and what a melancholy visage was framed by the old black hood.

The sight caused the good man to yield to the desire which had just found expression in his mind.

"Listen, Mère Mathieu; I have been thinking while you were away. Since my mother is dead, I have enough for you two. So I will keep you with me if you are willing. You can take care of the house, and I will help you bring up the child.

The poor woman uttered a cry; sank down into a chair and covered her face with her hands; as the noise awakened the child, Jean took it from the cradle, looked at it intently, and dropped on its soft, tender cheek a kiss that was almost paternal.

But this was not all. The generous conduct of Jean Vignol was advantageous to him. To be sure, he kept on serving his special public with his sensational romances, but in his last work, "L'Orphelin de Belleville," there was a something that had been lacking before, and that moved the grisettes to tears. The circulation of the Petit Proletaire increased, and he was paid four sous a line.

The story was even copied in several provincial papers; and when, the other day, Jean went to the office of the treasurer of the Society of Literary Men for his pay, he had the one joy of his literary career.

The most illustrious, the first of modern novelists, touched him on the shoulder and said:

"Say, Monsieur Vignol, I have read your later works, and I have found in them some very good, sincere, and touching things concerning children."

The poor man blushed up to his ears.

"Many thanks," he replied, beaming with joy. "But you see—that is because—now—when I write about babies—I copy from nature!"—François Coppée in The Parisian.

"A Book of Country Clouds and Sunshine." Text and illustrations by Clifton Johnson. Published by Lee & Shepard. Boston. 1897. Price, $2.50.

A Book of the Week. The author and illustrator of this volume spent his boyhood on a New England farm, and most of his life has been lived in a little country town on the Connecticut River. At fifteen years of age he left school, and for five years was an assistant in a book shop. Then he began to sketch and write, and gradually his contributions were accepted by the periodicals. For several years he studied during the winter in the art schools in New York, and to aid him in his work, he began to take photographs. His first book, "The New England Country," was illustrated from his own pictures, and he has since published "The Country School," "The Farmer's Boy," and an illustrated edition of White's "Selborne." He is thoroughly familiar with the farm life of his native land, and writes of its pleasures, its trials, and its hardships, with full knowledge and sympathy. "Country Clouds and Sunshine" is a complete description of the life on a New England farm in spring, summer, autumn, and winter: of the talks round the great stove in the grocery, of the schools, the parson and his preaching, the election of town officers, the tilling of the fields, and the harvesting of the crops. It is a hard, narrow provincial life, of course, but it trains strong, self-reliant characters, and when the inhabitants of these out-of-the-way regions have any love for the beauties of nature and any taste for the duties that are bred in books, they often become much more genuinely cultivated than townspeople. Of the superficial smartness of the city-reared man or woman they possess little, and are none the worse for that; of a homely, clear-headed common sense they often have a considerable fund. Mr. Johnson's photographs display much taste: they have little or none of that appalling sharpness and hideous distinctness which constitute the ideal of the commercial photographer, but show a true subordination of the unimportant details to the central motif of the picture. Being ourselves enthusiastic photographers, Mr. Johnson's book has afforded us much pleasure: it is full of suggestions. The picture of a ferryman, on page 49, gives a good idea of Mr. Johnson's photographic style: the distance is indicated, but is not obtrusive; the interest is centered on the ferryman and his boat. Many a commercial or so-called "professional" photographer would have given us a background in which every detail was sharp and distinct, and so distracted our eyes from the real object of attention—the boatman. Not so the photographer who is also an artist. "His Own House-keeper," on page 86, an old fellow sitting near a stove and paring potatoes into a pan, is also an excellent picture. The volume is of crown quarto size, printed upon excellent paper, and attractively bound.

"Mannie Brown, that School-girl, and Edward Kennedy, that College Boy." By Mildred Rutherford, Athens, Ga. Published by the Peter Paul Book Company, 420 Main street, Buffalo, New York. Price, $1.

The author of these two stories, Miss Mildred Rutherford, is the daughter of a gentleman who was for more than thirty years Professor of Mathematics in the University of Georgia, and has herself been for fifteen years Principal of the Lucy Cobb Institute at Athens in that State. She has written books entitled "Bible Questions," "American Authors," and "English Authors." "Mannie Brown" is a tale of a wild harum-scarum school-girl, always teasing servants, cats and dogs, who develops later into a charming, good-bearded woman. "Edward Kennedy" is the story of a boy of similar character, who, after various escapades, falls in love with a nice girl, and becomes an entirely respectable person. Miss Rutherford tells us that the stories were written "in the hope of correcting certain habits of speech and manner which she had failed to reach by ordinary means." As to the value of the book as a guide to correct speech we do not feel entirely satisfied, but as the author tells us that it served its mission well, we must not be hypercritical. The most amusing chapter is that which tells of Mannie Brown's practical joke. Mannie makes up as an old woman bringing her daughter Maria to school, and in "cracker English" tells the proprietress of the school that she does not want her child taught "grammar, with a I love, and a you love, and a he love." She goes on: "I says to Maria, says I, 'If you do come home with any such foolishness, I'll be inclined to decline you, and I'll mighty soon parse you out to the wood-pile, whar you kin parse me a stick of wood, and I'll parse it over your head mighty soon,—you understand, don't you? I wants you to parse your teachers respectively, to parse fellows without a-winkin' at 'em, and to parse your zaminations—and that is all the grammar what I cares anything about.'" There is much sounder sense in this than the old woman, or perhaps even than the author, dreamed of. The book is satisfactorily printed, though the punctuation does strike us as odd at times.

The Peter Paul Book Company has in press a volume of poems by Irving Browne, for many years editor of the Albany Law Journal. Three hundred copies will be printed, and the volume will contain both grave and humorous verse.

The January issue of Pearson's Magazine (London) prints a striking article by J. Holt Schooling, in which he shows by the careful presentation of a large number of data that a considerable majority of the able men of Great Britain are born south of a line drawn from the Wash in Lincolnshire to the River Severn. Sixty per cent. of the inventors, sixty-two per cent. of the distinguished soldiers, sailors, lawyers and churchmen, sixty-seven per cent. of the statesmen, seventy-one per cent. of the authors, seventy-five per cent. of the artists, and no fewer than eighty per cent. of the poets, first see the light of day to the south of this dividing line. More than this, the counties of Cumberland, Westmoreland, Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, Cambridge, and Essex, produce fewer eminent men than any other counties, and may all be traversed by a curved line, which is called "the curve of least talent." The high value of an intellectual atmosphere in producing and stimulating talent is shown by the fact that Middlesex, small in area though it is, produces far more able men than any other county of the United Kingdom. Mr. Francis Galton, a very able investigator and man of science, arrived at the same conclusion as Mr. Schooling as to the high intellectuality of London. England and Wales, taken together, produce more than the proportionate number of clever men to be expected from their area and population, while Ireland (mother of the political rulers of the United States) produces far fewer men of high intellectual power than would be expected of its area and population. To express the fact diagrammatically—Ireland ought to produce a number of clever men represented by a block nearly nine-tenths of an inch square, whereas it does produce only enough clever men to fill a block six-sixteenths of an inch square; that is, it produces only two-thirds as many clever men as it should produce. (This little calculation is recommended to the Bookman's mathematical man with our respects). The Irish professional patriots, who think that they ought to rule not only the British Empire, but the United States of America as well, are requested to note their natural inferiority to the population of the rest of the United Kingdom; or, as the vulgar not inexpressively say, to put these facts in their pipes and smoke them. It is pretty strong tobacco, but is genuine leaf all through.

A nicely gotten up and useful little book for tourists is that issued by The Traveler, entitled "Outings in California." It furnishes information with reference to San Francisco and vicinity, Mt. Shasta, Yosemite Valley, Stanford University, the Missions of California, and many other places that a tourist will be likely to wish to visit. Scattered liberally through the pages are photogravures of some of the well-known scenes in San Francisco and California. The principal hotels throughout the State are noted, and the rates of accommodation quoted. A copy of this useful handbook may be obtained from the office of The Traveler for the moderate price of ten cents.

Edgar Fawcett, in his department entitled "Men, Manners and Moods" in Collier's Weekly for February 4th, gives us so strange a criterion of literary merit that we cannot help commenting on it. Speaking of Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome he says that they "were sneered at by Matthew Arnold, though they had already been the wonder and delight of thousands." But then Martin Tupper's poems were a real "delight" to thousands: the Police Gazette, the New York Journal, the San Francisco Examiner, are the delight of thousands, and cause thousands more to "wonder" why in the world they are permitted to exist. Mr. Fawcett's new literary criterion will cause "wonder" in the minds of as many intelligent people as become aware of it. Of course, we do not mean to say that Macaulay's Lays are not very proper sources of delight, but we do object to having the "wonder and delight" of thousands set up as a final test of literary excellence.

The English edition of Dr. Nansen's book," says the London Daily Chronicle, "is nearly all in type, and he has only to conclude his revision of the proofs. Two shorthand writers have been with the explorer almost since he arrived at his home near Christiania. He has practically dictated the book to them, and has absolutely declined to permit of the task being interrupted by any other claims upon him. The work will be in two large volumes, with a fine etched portrait of Nansen. The history of this portrait is interesting, not to say romantic. It was taken on the day before Nansen left the Fram, and, moreover, he was his own photographer. The picture shows him in the cabin of his stout little ship. The artist who prepared the etching has had the advantage of recent sittings from its subject. Another feature of the book will be a series of reproductions of sketches in color, made by Nansen. These give a vivid idea of Arctic scenery, and are quite remarkable."

In the February issue of The Arena, Dr. W. T. Harris, the U. S. Commissioner of Education, discusses the New Education, Annie N. Meyer the Problem of the Novel, Professor Frank Parsons the Telegraph Monopoly, and Lucy L. Crandall holds forth on something she calls Pneumatology, which she defines as the "science of spirit." We have sometimes heard of the scientific spirit, but never before of the "science of spirit." Had not an explanation of the word been given, we should have gone away supposing "Pneumatology" to be the science of wind, just as Meteorology is the science of the weather, and Biology the science of life, and we should probably have thought that the article was intended to be of service to budding politicians. Whatever Lucy's new matology may be, we sincerely hope that the clumsy word may not find a permanent place in our dictionaries, which are already swollen to absolutely indelicate proportions by the monstrosities spawned by men of science, devoid of taste and of an elementary knowledge of language.

A VERY important case is now before Superior Judge Smith, of Santa Cruz. The action was brought by one Struve against the Western Sugar Company, for $20,000 damages alleged to have been caused by the dumping of quantities of sugar beet pulp on his lands. The case is an important one, as having a bearing upon this great industry of California. Mr. Samuel M. Shortridge is ably defending the case, with every prospect of securing a verdict.

ONE of the most satisfactory acquaintances it is possible for a lover of the pipe to make is "Yale Mixture," manufactured by the American Tobacco Company. Yale Mixture finds a warm spot in the heart of the discriminating smoker the moment he samples it.

Of the making of many kinds of whiskey there is no end, but one of the best—the one whose merits keep it on every well-conducted bar—a popular, prime drink good for all weather and everywhere, is Cutter Whiskey, of which excellent goods E. Martin & Co., at 411 Market street, are sole Pacific Coast agents.

Wide awake visitors would be as likely to miss seeing seal rocks and Golden Gate Park, as they would to neglect a call on Geo. T. Marsh & Co., at 625 Market street, under the Palace. The finest Japanese art goods, curios and tapestries, kept by Marsh are worth a long trip to see.

MOTHERS, be sure and use "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for your children while teething.

THE IMPRESSION SHE MADE — W. W. W. LIFE

No doubt she had gams and members —
All being things have, as a rule,
But really she mostly impressed me
As a piece of extremely green tulle.

She could move—for we danced, I remember,
And tripped on that confounded stool)
While waiting, I thought of her only
As an arful of very green tulle.

Then she ate, for I took her to supper—
All she wanted was "something that's cool;"
So I brought pistachio ice, meanwhile thinking,
Just the thing for a bit of green tulle.

I was with her the whole of the evening,
And I flirted and talked like a fool;
Now my only remembrance of her,
Is of something in very green tulle.

Should we meet in the streets on the morrow,
I should pass her, I know, like a mule;
I sha'n't know her again till I meet her
Arrayed in that very green tulle.

A SUCCESSFUL HOME INDUSTRY.

THE success that has attended the Siebe Shoe Company, manufacturer of ladies fine footwear, demonstrates that it is not necessary for an article to be imported in order to find ready sale, once that its merits are known. This company, whose large three-story factory is at 25 to 31 Jessie street, this city, is at present running on full time, and turning out from four hundred to five hundred pairs of ladies' fine shoes every day of ten hours. The factory employs about one hundred hands—all white labor, and ships shoes to all points on the Coast and to the countries beyond the Pacific. The capacity of the Siebe Shoe Company was materially increased last fall by the introduction of the very latest machinery, but it is found difficult to keep up with the growing business. The goods turned out are of the finest grade, and they are not only made of the very best materials that can be bought, put together by skilled labor, under expert supervision; but they are the latest shapes and most graceful, stylish finish. Mr. A. D. Tourtilotte is the general manager and treasurer, and the gratifying success of the company is largely due to his energy and excellent business judgment.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

A BEAUTIFUL picture of the interior of the conservatory in Golden Gate Park appears with this number of the NEWS LETTER. It will make a most desirable addition to the portfolio of views that are being issued with this paper.

All flowers may be beautiful—but some are more beautiful than others; and it is this kind that one always gets at Leopold's, at 39 Post street. The choicest, daintiest buds and most fragrant bouquets are found at his place; and his prices are very reasonable.

The Comstock Mining Market.

Were it not for the fact that an ability to raise prices of the leading shares of Comstock companies is demonstrated from time to time, the habitual lethargic condition of the market would suggest a decline of vitality and the rapid shortening of a very brief span of existence. The situation is certainly anything but attractive for persons speculatively inclined. The fluctuations, when there are any, are so narrow that the margins of profit rarely cover the ordinary commissions for brokerage. Con. Cal. Virginia has propped prices up for some time past all along the line, but the withdrawal of support in that quarter for a time during the week was quickly followed by a decline in all directions. It is hoped that a contest for control of Hale & Norcross will put another breath of life into the business, by bringing in some money from the cliques which are after the loaves and fishes in the way of salaries. Unfortunately these are too often secured now on the cheap and even dancing is barred to the people who must eventually be assessed to pay the piper. The method of keeping the faithful up to the rack now with wind seems to recommend itself to the new manipulator as an exponent of the up-to-date theory of making money without risking a dollar, literally squeezing blood out of a turnip. It must surprise many of these smooth individuals themselves at times to note the success of a game which can only be played on a mind blinded by the inordinate cupidity of a desperate gambler. A stock market would prove a boon to this city by putting much hoarded capital into circulation, but it begins to look doubtful if such a happy result will ever be attained dependent upon the efforts of any of the cliques which now control the mines. Their sole efforts seem to be directed to squeezing the orange as dry as possible by scientific means, little calculated to engender the favorable opinion of outside operators in the market. To say the policy is shortsighted would but feebly express it.

To Develop The Alabama.

A representative of a syndicate operating the Alabama mine, of Tuolumne County, says that there is no intention of floating the property in London in its present condition, and that the amount of $600,000 mentioned in the incorporation of the company in that city, simply represents the total capital stock, which no effort is being made to sell. According to the statement of this gentleman, all that was paid for the mine originally was $40,000, or $5,000 less than the figures quoted in the NEWS LETTER as the purchasing price paid to the Bell estate. The syndicate is composed of six men of means, who are now spending $2,000 monthly in sinking the shaft and opening up the mine, which it is hoped will repay the investment. Should it develop into a paying property, then the London company will take hold, and if not, the whole business will be dropped, and the expenses charged to profit and loss account. This is a fair enough proposition, and one which should recommend itself to other promoters who are but too ready to dump their wares on the market, regardless of how their properties turn out. There is no reason why the Alabama should not develop into a high-priced property. It is in a good location on the mother lode, and like many other mines on the famous mineralized belt, it may have a great future. People who are well disposed to the development of the mining industry in California can but wish for the success of any venture of the kind conducted upon the common-sense and practical lines adopted by the syndicate in control of this property.

Another event of the week has been the passing of the Gold Mining Exchange of San Francisco. The names of all the leading mining men of the northern portion of the State are on the roll of membership, but among them all only some half a dozen figured at the end of the list of paying subscribers. The collapse is a disgrace to the city, and a direct reflection upon the much vaunted liberality of our mining men. The Los Angeles Exchange still exists, however, to maintain the dignity of the industry in California.

The Truth Leaking Out.

To our London friends interested in the Holcomb Valley Co., Limited, we commend the following excerpt from the latest report of the State Mineralogist, confirmatory of the facts which for nearly ten years past we have been trying to drill into their thick pates. After speaking of the large amount of money expended in property, machinery, experiments, etc., the report says: "A dredging machine (steam shovel) has been employed for three years past, but it has been found that the quantity of gold in the gravel is too small to make such extensive operations remunerative. * * * Water for sluicing has to be pumped from wells, the amount of stripping required is usually (?) large, and the grade of the valley insufficient to make mining on a large scale possible." The report then goes on to say that the proposition of tunneling through the mountains on the north rim of the basin for draining the valley and for an outlet for tailings, etc., does not seem feasible. This is the old Valley Gold launched in London with such a flourish of trumpets about the same time as the Union Gold infamy was perpetrated. Since then two condemnatory reports have been filed with the management, one by John Williams, a practical miner, employed at the instance of one Lloyd, a shareholder, and the other by John Hays Hammond. Neither of these reports have even yet seen daylight, so far as the British public is concerned. Yet the milking process has gone on. An investigation of this transaction from beginning to end should be made by the proper authorities in Great Britain.

A Big Mining Sale.

The sale of a one-sixth interest in the Mariposa grant reported this week, is an event of more than ordinary importance, considering that it makes the first break in a combination which has kept one of the most extensive and promising mineral tracts in the world idle for years past. Mr. Hayward disposed of a one-sixth interest to H. Bratnoher, representing the London Exploration Company, for \$166,666 $\frac{2}{3}$, at the rate of \$1,000,000 for the whole tract. It was upon this grant that the old Agua Fria Company of London started up work in 1851. Several promising mines were developed later, notably the Josephine and Pine Tree, but litigation and other troubles have kept them closed down over twenty years. The Mariposa grant was originally owned by General Fremont, and subsequently by Eugene Kelly & Co., of New York. The present owners of the remaining interests in the property are John W. Mackay, Senator J. P. Jones, and the Hobart estate.

The Gambling Powder Men.

People who are interested in the Giant Powder deal to the extent of speculating when the trap will be sprung upon the victims, who are expected to meet the assessment necessary to cover the heavy outstanding indebtedness of the company, favor the belief that the levy will not be made until the compact now contemplated with the other companies is signed and sealed. This will enable the manipulators of shares which are getting to be notoriously speculative, to work the last dollar out of the deal on the street rumors of a consummated combine, which has all along been used to bait the trap set for credulous money seekers on California street. The business principle which adds to the sterling value of industrial shares as an investment, is based upon manufactured products and ready markets, and not on stock jobbing facilities. A comparison between the California and Giant Companies stocks, as they appear on the list of the Exchange, is the best illustration of this. The one firmly held at high prices, representing a wealthy solid concern; the other bobbing up and down like a jack-in-the-box at the will of the manipulators. It is a matter of record, to which the California people can point with pride, showing how closely held their stock is by old and wealthy local families, that during the past sixteen years the transfers have not exceeded five hundred shares. Prices are quoted for the stock, but no sales are ever made in the Board to-day. None can be had. This will strike some people as strange, when they come to think of it, after watching the way the stock of other industrials in this line are hattered about from pillar to post.

John Lauer

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will plar the devil, sir, with you."

THERE is something very mysteriously funny about the Abbott-Quackenbush case, now on trial before Judge Seawell. It looks funny, deucedly funny, my masters, that the conscientious dailies should admit only one side of the testimony, and that all in favor of old Quack himself. A man who appears on the record as Expert T. Kytaka, who looks as if he had not taken a bath for a month, and who carries soil enough under his nails to grow artichokes and green peas, testified that the marriage acknowledgment was a palpable forgery. Now, it matters not a tinker's oath to the T. C. whether or not old Quack married Mrs. Abbott, but it does matter that a fellow who does not know the a. b. c. of chemistry should be paid for exposing his ignorance. Dr. Harry West Miller, a graduate of Strashburg, with the Diploma of Doctor of Natural Sciences was called, and testified in the case, but not a line regarding his testimony has appeared. If this is not giving the poor old public another clip on its all too credulous snout, ye may slate Duckworth for dispenser of free soap to the unemployed masses.

MIKE BRANNIGAN is in town. Mike the doughty, Mike who the Vigilantes in the spring of '50 chased across the border because they esteemed the descendant of the great O'Brannigans anything but an ornament to the society of the period. Mr. O'Brannigan used to be a hackman in those early days, and the flyest lad that ever sat on the box. Now he wears diamonds, and salutes the very men who chased him with a slap on the back, and an invitation to drink. But the O'Brannigan is sadly surprised at the demoralization of the times. "Why," says that genial fellow, "if dose boys did dose t'ings in my time, dere would be scores of us a flying wid the Vigilantes at our heels." True for thee, gentle Mike, true as gospel; but you know they say that if a skinned eel is put back in the water again, he will gradually get used to skinning. We could hardly get along now without our municipal thieves. We should feel awfully lonesome.

BLESS us, bow shocked the dailies are at this Vanderbilt scandal, and how they are trying to hush it up by devoting several columns every morning on speculating who the monster that assailed the lady's fair fame could be, and what he actually did say about her. What a ghoulish dance those journals are enjoying opposite the door of that closet where the skeleton lies, weighted down with a flat iron. How they long to peek in through the keyhole, and catch just one glimpse of his ugliness. With exultation they'd lug him forth if they could get a single finger on him. And all the time they are condoling with the persecuted young couple. By the snake in the garden, there never was hypocrisy that could equal this!

JAMES HAMILTON, the Tbespians' pillar, has imported a waistcoat from Scotland, which is a dream of the bonny blue heather. Likewise two claymores for his celebrated sword dance to be given on Washington's Birthday for the benefit of the Associated Charities. Likewise a mull filled with Scotch snuff. Mr. Hamilton is a member of that grand clan which blessed His Grace of Argyle when he put up the milestones in Argyleshire, which they found so convenient for scratching posts.

ANTONY HELLMAN is to be the Prince of the Carnival at the Art Association bal masque. Sweet of voice and light of foot is Tony, who won his laurels years ago at many a hard fought Bohemian low jinks. But a rumor is current in the life class of the Art School, that Mr. Hellman's cast, the Apollo Belvedere of the Latin Quarter, has run to corns.

IS that white-winged old philanthropist, ex-horse Sutro, going to return those fees which he and his clerk illegally pocketed? Mayor Phelan has taken the correct view of the matter, and turned his into the city treasury. Pungle, thou old mole, pungle, give unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's.

ONE Mr. Hineckley, wandering along the City Front, and bathing his mustaches in the deep, dark liquids which the water-side tavern keeper dispenses, cast his eye on the tower of the new depot. Mr. Hineckley, or Blineckly, at once made the remarkable discovery that it was out of plumb, or perch, or whatever the scientific slang assigns to a crooked structure. He kept on blinking, until he imagined the world should know all about it, and he told the world the result of his blinking, also casting a stone at Howard C. Holmes, the official engineer of the Harbor Commissioners. Now, as Mr. Hohnes has for the last few years constructed all the important improvements along the harbor front, and as his ability as not alone a brilliant, but a most careful and painstaking engineer, is unquestioned, he very properly declined to be drawn into a controversy with Mr. Blineckly. So the merry world wags. If notoriety does not come naturally to some mortals, by the thigh bone of Pactolus, they will stoop into the sewer to grasp it.

AN admirable and marvelous example of the power of a lawyer's jaw was that incident where Mr. Lezinsky, a member of the bar, was struck in the head and knocked insensible by a flying quail. What a vast field of speculation this opens to the inquiring mind. If a single quail, landing on a Stockton lawyer's chin, will bowl him over, what size or manner of bird would it require to prostrate Reuben Lloyd, or Colonel Kowalsky? Would the condor, the monarch of the Andes, have any effect upon the Kowalsky jaw, or would not rather the noble bird drop to the earth from the force of the impact, while the Colonel would inquire what sort of mosquito was that which brushed his leonine headpiece? A winged emu banging against Mr. Lloyd's chin would have reason to repent its rashness, and would go on crutches for a month as a result of the adventure.

THERE can be no better way to get a good dose of dyspepsia than to ponder over one of the Saturday Bulletin's menus for a Sunday dinner. Stomach of the Puritans! what an ecstasy of pie. Stick-jaw, stick-jaw everywhere, and not a bite to eat. And the art with which it is strung out. Why, an honest Hibernian potato would fail to recognize itself under the mass of French aliases poured on its devoted head by the Bulletin epicure. Upon no such baby food doth the stalwart Colonel Crothers feed. Steaks and strong ale are the brickwork upon which that great structure stands. But he is shockingly reckless of the health of his subscribers.

SUPERVISOR Delany is acknowledged on all sides to be a fine figure of a man. The boys like to poke fun at the Major, and one asked him a few days ago for his influence to obtain a janitorship. "Arra, they're all gone," said the city father. "Well, thin, give me that place about the polis. Shure I woted for you," persisted the constituent. "What place?" asked the Major, pricking up his ears. "Why, polishing the buttons on the officers' uniforms," said the patriot. "Not by a d—d sight," rejoined the Major, who had never heard before of that lucrative position, "that's reserved." And he passed on with that martial air which so well becomes him.

WILLIS POLK, the gay, the debonnaire,
With Irish has locked horns,
Stirred up again a nasty smell,
And trod on John P.'s corns.

John P., John P., pray cautious be,
And keep within your camp,
Nor agitate the odors vile,
Of that postoffice swamp.

LOUIS JAMES attributes the failure of Spartacus to those frightful prints of the gladiator, which were hung upon the outer walls of this city. Mr. James is represented as a man whose face is contorted from the effects of a pot of Boston beans, bastily swallowed without the necessary mastication.

IT would be the funniest thing in the world if Butler, the demon of the Blue Mountains, should prove to be a reputable citizen, quite innocent of blood shedding. Oh, ye sweet girls of the newspapers, who discovered all the damning lines in Butler's mug, what would become of ye then?

THE supremacy of the "bud" element is settled—the older girls can't hold their own against the débutantes. This fact is demonstrated by the decadence of the old-time "Cotillion Club," and the success of the Friday Fortnightlies, which this season is more marked than usual. Some people assert that because the latter organization is cheaper it has drawn better; but that is nonsense. Men go where the girls are new, and the sans gene breeziness of "just out" pervaades, in preference to the four or five seasons' belles who are thoroughly "up" in worldly wisdom; and where the men go women are sure to follow; hence the large attendance at the younger set of cotillion dances.

"Nothing succeeds like success" is an old axiom, and, like most old axioms, true. Can anything illustrate this better than the social attentions being showered upon the wife of Sir Bache Cunard, in Gotham's fashionable set, by people who would have quietly let her pass in silence, when as little Maude Burke she left San Francisco and achieved her first step as Fred Tichenor's step-daughter. That she was a bright, agreeable girl was acknowledged by all, but the conquest of a wealthy British Baronet has cast a halo around her head that has captured Anglomania. Much speculation is rife in the swim as to who will have the enviable position of châtelaine in the Howard mansion recently purchased by Colonel Fred Crocker. Society is bewailing the fact that the approaching season of French opera will be held in Lent, for, of course, the ultra-fashionable folk will not go. IMPERIAL CHEMICAL M'FG. CO.

292 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

For sale by Druggists and Hairdressers in San Francisco; sold and applied by Stanislas Strozynski and Goldstein & Cohn.

DEAR EDITH: The dress materials to be worn this season are so many and varied that every type of woman will be able to adorn herself in the special color and texture which sets off to the greatest advantage her personal charms.

Some very dainty gowns are to be made of Scotch friezes in mixed colorings, such as navy blue dotted in light blue, wine color and gold, laurel brown speckled in may-flower pink, olive and wood violet, pussy willow green lined and dashed in buttercup, lily white and silver. The camel's hair fabrics for early spring are to become quite popular, too, especially for very young women, who are slender and girlish in figure. They will be made up with bright velvets and considerable passementerie and embroidery. One new feature in these frocks will be the whole velvet sleeves, which are now appearing in the latest London examples.

Empress, Venetian, Oxford suitings and the smooth diagonal cloths help to make up a large assortment of fabrics for the early spring.

The newest colors are along the wine, plum, red purple, plumetis, and Napoleon blue lines. How long these will last, how soon they will be supplanted, how they will appeal to womankind, are all a conjecture.

The incoming of the Princess gown is one of the most important moves made by the dressmakers.

Their minds have been much taken up with the new trimmed skirt, and, as a rule, they have not altogether subscribed to it, and it is thought that the introducing of the Princess gown as a foil is a sop to their wounded taste.

For some seasons now the modistes have been devoting their time almost exclusively to skirt shaping. They have had special instruction from artists in the work. To get the lines as graceful as possible, they have experimented, and they have toiled early and late to produce the elegant plain skirts of to-day. The greatest minds in the dress world have been brought to bear upon the matter, and stiffening, cambrics, crinoline, and all manner of material has been rearranged, invented, and put together to make the design wide in one direction, narrow and sloping in another, rounding and circular in a third, and, above all, to make this model garment crackle and rustle, swish and swirl until everything and everybody should know of its existence. And now the few Paris designers, who are monarchs of fashion, order it away, and speak of a trimmed skirt which can be of any shape, size, or condition. So long as it is well covered up with trimmings, the modistes will not stand it; hence the Princess frock, which has a plain underpart, and can be treated in the same manner as the old plain skirt. A very fashionable New Yorker, whose sagacity in these matters is always accepted as gospel, recently gave an order to a Twenty-third street establishment for a Princess gown in chestnut brown diagonal cloth. It will be a very graceful and useful gown. The long lines and curves which are essential to the Princess gown will give a grace and artistic charm to the wearer's figure, and the simplicity and plainness of trimming will only add to this.

The sleeves are of velvet, and tiny velvet lines mark each long seam and curve. A wide band of velvet makes a splendid foot trimming. In the upper half of the bust, bands of velvet cross from one shoulder to the other, draping to the waist, where they are caught by an old Flemish buckle.

There is even a larger variety of materials shown for house wear and social functions than for street wear. Of these there are the satin cloths, zibelines, brocaded silks, satins, Japanese crepes, plumetis satin drap d'te and braided cloths.

The hand that pulled for me
These honny blossoms—snowdrops white,
Blue violets, yellow aconite,
And frail anemone.

Spring flowers! Ah! loyal heart and true,
Spring flowers for me, who never knew
The gladness of life's spring;
Who never felt the sunshine warm,
Whose youth was wrapped in cloud and storm,
The darkest fate could bring.

Unmeet for me. Yet lay them here,
Close to my hand and draw a-near
With your grave, tender smile;
Nay, closer yet, that I may trace
Each feature of the well-known face,
Although I sigh the while.

Time-worn, but resolute, I see
The face that makes earth heaven to me
Through these my shortening days.
Grief-worn, but patient, it has cheered
My heart that doubted, shrank, and feared
In life's bewildering maze.

It might have made my summer bliss—
Ah, dearest! take it not amiss,
That I am sad to-day.
We met too late—dull autumn's time
Had touched our lives with chilling rime,
Our skies were bleak and gray.

We met too late—for us no spring
Might lead to summer blossoming.
And yet it might have been!
If I had known you when the flowers
Were budding in life's early hours,
And all hope's leaves were green!

It might have been! But ah! not now,
Too late, too late, for lover's vow,
Too late for wifely kiss,
Too late for dreams of love and home,
'The time of singing birds is come,"
Sweet music I must miss.

Too late! But see! I take from you
The snowdrop white, the violet blue,
The pale anemone.
And, dear, I think that otherwhere,
A spring eternal, new and fair,
Doth wait for you and me.

SONG.—ROBERT KELLY WEEKS.

Like a fettered hoat that pants and pulls,
And struggles to be free,
When the wind is up, and the whirling gulls
Are wild with ecstacy—
Is my heart apart from thee!

Like a hoat that leans, that leaps, that flies,
That sings along the sea,
With a sunny shower of drops that rise
And fall melodiously—
Is my heart, sweetheart, is my heart,
Is my heart approaching thee!

EARTH'S IMMORTALITIES.—ROBERT BROWNING.

See, as the prettiest graves will do in time,
Our poet wants the freshness of its prime;
Spite of the sexton's hrowing horse, the sods
Have struggled through its hiding osier rods;
Headstoe and half-sunk footstone lean awry,
Wanting the brickwork fomisht by and by;
How the minute gray lichens, plate o'er plate,
Have softened down the dispart name and date!

THE 21st annual banquet of the Fire Underwriters of the Pacific, took place at the Maison Riche on Wednesday evening last. Covers were laid for eighty-five members and their guests. The President of the Underwriters, Herbert Folger, did the honors of the banquet gracefully. One of the most pleasant incidents of the dinner was not down on the programme, and came in the form of a telegram from J. W. G. Cofran, formerly of this city, but now manager of the old Hartford, with headquarters in Chicago, bearing his congratulations and requesting that a couple of cases of wine be sent up at his expense. The toasts that followed were to the absent underwriter, and were drunk standing to the refrain, "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow." The banquet was an unqualified success.

W. G. Taffender has been made general manager and secretary of the American Protective Accident Association. The association has been operated from Redlands in the southern part of the State hitherto, but headquarters will be at once established here.

G. C. Pratt, who has been for some time California manager of the Provident Savings Life Insurance Society, has resigned in favor of Geo. L. North, who some years ago represented the Equitable Life Assurance Society in a similar capacity. The position carries the field in California and Nevada.

S. Purcell, United States Manager of the Sun Insurance Office, who came West some weeks ago to transfer the agency to W. J. Callingham, has returned to New York.

It is understood that a new Accident and Sick Benefit Society is to be soon organized in Los Angeles, to be operated on the assessment plan, and will shortly make the necessary deposit with the Insurance Commissioner. It will make the fifth home company of this character operating on the Pacific Coast.

The proceedings of the Underwriters' Convention, which was held this week, will soon be issued in book form for general distribution. The pamphlet will contain several valuable papers pertinent to the business on this Coast.

W. L. Gazzam, a well-known Seattle insurance man, is in the city.

Thos. S. Chard, manager of the Fireman's Fund for the Western States, with headquarters in Chicago, has been in the city for the past week.

Assistant General Manager Brewster, of the Scottish Union and National, is still in San Francisco.

AT THE RACES.

RACING closes at Oakland this week, and Ingleside reopens Monday, with a very attractive two weeks programme. The racing at Oakland has been stale and very commonplace—the principal features being the disgraceful performance of Installator, who ran unplaced in a race, where he should have been the contending horse at the finish; and the performance of J. O. C., who also ran unplaced, in a race he should have won.

One of the innovations at the Oakland track has been the recall flag—to call the horses back after a false start. That the public would be protected with a recall flag is what the advocates of the recall flag promised; and Monday at Oakland witnessed some of this protection. It was the second race on the card and had only five starters. As the barrier was raised, Suisun, the favorite in the betting, went to the front; the starter shook his recall flag, and the others pulled up; he then ordered them to go again, thus giving the heavily backed Suisun the race. Applause, the second choice, set sail after Suisun, and nearly caught him under the wire. With an even break, Applause could not have lost. These are the kind of races that furnish scandal for the race track gossips, and it will be many a day before the echoes of this one die out. One old-timer remarked, after witnessing the race, that it was the best way he had yet seen of making a favorite win a race. Gutenberg, in its day, was enterprising—but he remarked, (There are others and I'll give you a piece of good advice, my boy. When you're at Ingleside, play the horses on form, and when you're at Guten)—or I mean Oakland—play them on information and take your chances."

That terrible wash-tub! This is the way it looks to the women who do their washing in the old-fashioned way. They dread it—and no wonder. All because they won't use Pearline. Use Pearline—use it just as directed—soak, boil and rinse the clothes—and the wash-tub won't be a bug-bear. No hard work—no inhaling of fetid steam—no wearing rubbing—no torn clothes—nothing but economy.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 510 JAMES PYLE, New York.

THE Salvation Army has few more ardent admirers than W. W. Foote, who openly proclaims his approval of the order as the best of all religious organizations. He never neglects an opportunity to purchase a copy of the War Cry, and all the Army lassies who peddle papers have come to know Foote, and to understand that the successful criminal lawyer can always be depended on to relieve them of unsold editions of their official organ. They press this advantage to the limit sometimes, but, to use their own words, "Billy Foote never kicks."

Foote has been espousing the candidacy of Rudolph Herold for the place on the Board of Harbor Commissioners for San Francisco, soon to be vacated by "Uncle" Dan Cole, whose term is about to expire. In the interests of the insurance agent's candidature, Foote, Herold, and Barney Murphy, of San Jose, after a combined appeal to the Governor, were dining together in the Grill Room. The little party was no sooner seated than a blue-gowned figure demurely poked a War Cry beneath Foote's nose. With an air of gratitude for so valuable a suggestion, Foote immediately bought three copies, handing one each to Barney and Rudy. They were soon joined by Charles M. Shortridge, and the editor had not finished shaking hands all around until another poke bonnet loomed up, and four more War Crys were added to the dinner delicacies. Then Samuel M. Shortridge sauntered in, and before the tall attorney had adjusted his glasses to scan the menu card, a third Salvation Army girl was at Foote's side. The other diners, unappreciative of Foote's little gifts, began to gey him as "a good thing" and "an easy mark." Without a murmur Billy paid for five additional copies, and as the Hallelujah lassie was leaving, he called her back.

"By the way, my girl," he said, with a bland smile, modulating his usually stentorian tones, "If there are any more soldiers of your regiment about, send them in to us. These gentlemen," pointing to the quartette at his table, each with a pile of War Crys at his plate, and all looking rather silly, "these gentlemen need all the innocent reading matter procurable."

When young Gus Costigan so far forgot himself as to sit in the Cosmos Club with one boot gracefully extended along the sill of an open window, his fellow members considered it a just retribution that misfortune should overtake him in the shape of a suddenly descending window sash, which inflicted painful injuries on the Costigan foot. It was even whispered that a member of the committee on conduct of members, shocked at the display of such bad form in the hoot which filled the window, had purposely pulled a string, causing the sash to fall. However, that was never proven. "Cuss Costigan," as he is called at the Cosmos, nursed his wrath and his injured foot, and for the greater comfort of the damaged member slit open the side of an old patent leather boot, on which the patent had nearly expired. As he hobbled around on 'Change, the aperture in his shoe yawned until it became a distinct offense to its owner. To hide the growing canyon in the boot, "Cuss" plastered the edges of the rent with black ink, which had the happy effect of restoring much of its lost respectability to the leather. Among the Call Board men Costigan has the reputation of being a little "near," as the Scotch say, but he had never been considered parsimonious hitherto regarding his personal expenditures. It was with intense surprise, therefore, that his fellow brokers noticed a small section of the Costigan personality protruding from his boot. Beneath the severed leather, the black stocking had also parted, and through the torn cotton peeped one of Gus's little pink toes. Great excitement prevailed among the bulls and bears, until Costigan retired to a secluded corner of the Board room, and with the pen of a ready writer, carefully inked his toe beneath the double bole, until his foot was restored to its usual condition of uniform and shining blackness.

Since Lord and Lady Sholto Douglas, née Mooney, departed for Vancouver, British Columbia, a few months ago, in order that the possible heir to the Marquisate of Queensbury might be born on British soil, the movements of this scion of a noble house, and of the ex-concert hall favorite, have been kept so quiet that nothing concerning them has crept into print. That Lord Sholto has not changed his spots, however, since he fell in love with the song and dance artist at Fresno, has been established to the satisfaction of his friends. He arrived in British Columbia heralded in a manner which placed him in rather a ludicrous light, the booking clerk of the steamer having thus described his little family:

"Lady Sholto Douglas, maid and husband."

Sholto has elicited commendation in the Canadian town by his public devotion to his wife, with whom he daily parades the streets, and by the regularity of his attendance at Christ Church, the fashionable temple of Vancouver. When hidden from the public eye, he is reported to have still further endeared himself to his compatriots by the generous expenditure of his munificent allowance of fifteen hundred dollars per year. The story goes that in the English colony at Vancouver a plot was concocted to give Lord Sholto a night's entertainment, which should so thoroughly muddle his brain as to render him incapable of motion. The jollification, as planned, was duly observed, but before the night was over, all Lord Sholto's entertainers were under the table, while Queensbury's son went home with a clear head and steady legs. Since this episode, the younger son of the sporting Marquis has been allowed to maintain the even tenor of his temperance way, and it is unlikely that the attack upon his sobriety will be resumed.

As, conspicuous by his innocuous expression and lack of chin, Lord Sholto parades the streets in a long, flapping mackintosh of pale yellow, of a corresponding shade to his hair, eyes and face, the patient droop to his shoulders and his inturnd toes, comprise such a picture that it is said a lady "in a state of expectancy," after one hasty glance in his direction, was afraid to look again for fear of marking the baby.

Montgomery street was black with people for two blocks. Hundreds were jammed in between the buildings on opposite sides of the street. The crowd became so great that the thoroughfare was absolutely impassable, and even the horse cars were unable to proceed. As the crowd grew and became a multitude, some one on the outer edge of the assemblage tried to ascertain the reason for the spontaneous mass meeting. All sorts of disquieting rumors went flying back and forth.

"The Mills Building is on fire," suggested one.

"Ambrose Bierce has been shot," hazarded another.

"Butler has broke loose," ventured a third, unmindful of the grammar of his youth.

Finally an appeal for information was made to the man who is always posted, and whose information can invariably be relied upon as authentic.

"What's the matter?" the man of knowledge repeated, with great disdain. "Matter enough," he continued, excitedly, jerking his words out in gasping sentences. "Jim Corbett—champ'n o' th' world—takin' drink!"

Simon Newman, the grain dealer, no longer yearns for a bucolic existence, a recent experience during an attempted sale of mules having robbed country life of its charm and the unfortunate Simon of the use of one of his arms. It seems that Newman had a number of the long-eared tripe that he was desirous of selling. One day a man came along who wanted mules, but wanted them gentle. "Gentle," said the guileless Simon, "wby they're regular kittens." He undertook to illustrate the truth of his story by slapping one of the animals on the rump with rash familiarity—

When he subsequently returned to consciousness he asked in a voice broken by emotion and mule, "Was it an earthquake? Where am I?"

The buyer had fled; the mules are still unsold, and the doctor says that Simon's arm will soon be well.

BEECHAM'S PILLS will dispel the "blues."

AT THE CAPITOL.

SACRAMENTO, February 18, 1897.

THE most important matters of the week have been the desultory firing of guns in the departing Duckworth scandal, the Yountville Home bill, and the State printing battle. The State Printer defends himself as best he may by declaring that he had no alternative, and was compelled to refuse work because there was no money with which to pay the printers. The work for the Legislature and the Supreme Court has to be done, otherwise he would have cut down his force still further. There is, however, a very general belief that the conduct of the office has been wasteful, and that the Governor was justified in his veto. What the Board of Examiners will do with the matter remains to be seen.

Matthew Canavan.

Matthew Canavan, the Representative of the Twenty-third District, Marin County, is one of the most influential members of the Assembly. Mr. Canavan does not pose as an orator, but as occasion demands, knowing what he wants to say, he says it in a manner that commands attention and respect. Mr. Canavan lives in San Rafael and he was elected to represent his district by the largest majority ever given a candidate. He is particularly active in trying to secure the reimbursement of Marin County by the State, of such moneys expended on account of the trials, etc., of convicts imprisoned at San Quentin. The dairying interests are also being looked after by Mr. Canavan, as is a measure for the relief of the Volunteer Firemen. Mr. Canavan has introduced a resolution asking our Representatives in Congress to favor the Annexation of Hawaii, and he feels confident that it will pass. He is Chairman of the important Committee on States Prisons and Reformatory Institutions, and a member of the Committees on Commerce and Navigation; Labor and Capital; and Public works; State Capitol and Parks. A hard-working, capable and pains-taking legislator Mr. Canavan is worthy of the confidences imposed in him by the people.

Alden Anderson, the Representative of the Nineteenth Assembly District, is one of the bright young men who have influence and ability, and are the recognized leaders in the lower house. Mr. Anderson is a fruit grower and shipper, whose place of business and home are at Suisun, Solano County. This is the first time he has ever held public office, but it is to be hoped his constituents will not let it be the last time. Men like Mr. Anderson not only do credit to the particular district they represent, but are an honor to the State as well. To be elected, Mr. Anderson, who, by the way, is a staunch Republican, had to overcome an apparent fusion majority of nearly five hundred. That he did this, is a strong indication of his personal popularity. Ever alert in the interests of the people, Mr. Anderson is paying particular attention to the salaries of officers, as proscribed in the County Government act, and believes in reducing them, in keeping with the times. He is in favor of a State system of roads, and is a strong advocate of such hills looking to that end now before the Assembly. As an opponent of extravagance in public office, he has strenuously fought unnecessary appointments and useless junketings on the part of members of the body of which he is a member. Mr. Anderson is Chairman of the Committee on Fruit and Vine Interests, and a member of the Committee on County and Township Governments; Fish and Game; Commissions, Retrenchment, and Public Expenditures, and Roads and Highways.

The local delegation in the Senate has determined to recommend a bill for the establishment of a free market on the water-front at San Francisco. This proposition kicked up quite a row in the city some time ago, when advanced by the Merchants' Association. Just what will be done with it is uncertain, as the two houses are unable to agree on the proposition.

IN AID OF THE CALIFORNIA WOMAN'S HOSPITAL.

THE California Woman's Hospital has long been recognized as one of the most practical and useful institutions San Francisco, and its whole history has been an honor to those connected with it and a monument to the wisdom and generosity of its supporters. It has been a veritable blessing, as thousands of the afflicted can attest. As its sphere of usefulness widened, the demands on the hospital became so pressing that some eighteen months ago an annex was found absolutely necessary. This addition has just been completed at a cost of $18,500, and an entire cost including the lot, grading, etc., of $30,000. It is fitted up with all the medical appliances and conveniences, gives increased room for patients, and is in all respects admirably adapted to the uses for which it was intended. More than half of the large sum expended in erecting this necessary annex was given by Mrs. Mary A. Crocker, and the Mary A. Crocker trust and the Board of Lady Managers very gracefully decided by a regularly adopted resolution to designate the surgical and operating rooms as the "surgery erected by the generous donations of the Mary A. Crocker trust."

In aid of this most beneficent institution the managers will give a grand tea on the 27th inst., from 3 to 7 P. M., at which refreshments will be served, and musical selections, both orchestral and vocal, under the direction of Mrs. James Tucker, will be rendered. The tea will be given at the Crocker mansion, on California street, which has been generously placed at the disposal of the ladies for the occasion. A more admirable place could not be found for this purpose. There are thousands of friends of the Woman's hospital in the city who will be more than pleased to accept this opportunity to aid a most worthy object. Aside from the music, the splendid paintings and the refreshments are richly worth the price of the tickets, which is one dollar. From the 28th annual report of the hospital many interesting facts of its history are obtained, and from it are taken the names of the board of lady managers here appended: Mrs. L. L. Baker, President; Mrs. C. B. Alexander, First Vice-President; Mrs. J. H. Hatch, Second Vice-President; Mrs. E. R. Dimond, Third Vice-President; Mrs. Samuel W. Backus, Recording Secretary; Mrs. F. P. McLennau, Financial Secretary; Mrs. Charles E. Baneroff, Treasurer; Mrs. A. N. Towne, Mrs. J. T. Hoyt, Miss K. R. Stone, Mrs. F. D. Stadtmuller, Mrs. Samuel D. Mayer, Mrs. Wm. P. Reddington, Mrs. E. B. Stone, Mrs. Albert Gallatin, Mrs. H. E. Wise, Mrs. H. M. J. McMichael, Mrs. G. E. Butler, Mrs. A. Cheeserough, Mrs. G. F. Ashton, Mrs. James Otis.

SOCIETY

THERE were two pleasant affairs on Monday evening, the musicale at Mrs. E. B. Ponds, at which Frank Lincoln also assisted with some of his clever recitations; and the last dance of the Monday evening dancing class which drew together the largest number of guests present at any of their meetings this season. The dancing was also kept up long after supper, which was served at midnight, the hour at which "goodnights" were usually said. Mrs. W. P. Morgan's dinner on Tuesday evening was in honor of Captain and Mrs. Oscar Long. The decorations of the festive board were decidedly novel, consisting of miniature cannons, stacks of arms, drums and cannon halls, the tint of red prevailing.

One of the events of Wednesday evening was the performance of a burlesque of the Mikado by members of the Olympic Club, for the amusement of their lady friends. It was produced on a stage erected in the gymnasium and preceded by a Japanese glove contest; vocal music by the Moore brothers; banjo solos; athletic feats, etc. The whole affair was a huge success and most enthusiastically applauded by the large throng of guests who were present.

Last evening the Saturday Night Dancing Club gave their final cotillon of the season at Lunt's Hall. Miss Gerstle's tea is the most important event on the programme for to-day. It will be a very elaborate affair, concluding with a dinner and dance afterwards. To-night the long and eagerly-expected entertainment and hall at the Concordia Club will be an accomplished fact, and everything indicates that it will be among the best ever given by that very popular organization.

Brides, as a rule, prefer sunshine to showers for their marriage day, and therefore are those of recent date to be commiserated for having had such atrocious weather on the, to them at least, auspicious date. Nearly all of February's brides have been especially unfortunate in this respect, even those of this week most prominent in social life being little better off. The parental abode on Bush street was selected by Miss Louise Moulder as the locale for her marriage to Mr. J. H. Covode. Archbishop Riordan was the officiating priest, and owing to recent family affliction, the ceremony was witnessed by relatives and a few friends only, and was followed by supper. Miss Charlotte Moulder officiated as her sister's maid-of-honor, and the groom's brother, John Covode, supported him as best man.

Tuesday evening's wedding was a church one, being solemnized at St. Matthew's Lutheran church on Eddy street, where Miss Virginia Duisenberg became Mrs. Alexander Isenberg. It was a green and pink wedding, the huge palm leaves, beneath which the ceremony took place, coming all the way from the future home of the young couple—the Sandwich Islands. The sacred edifice was crowded with guests when the bridal party entered, the ushers, Messrs. Duisenberg, Ryland, Cook, Davies, and Dr. Barry leading the procession up the aisle. They were followed by the Misses Elsa Frank, Augusta Duisenberg, Clara Isenberg, Louise Sussman, Amy Cellarius, and Irma Schaefer, who were gowned alike in white organdie over Nile green silk, and carried bouquets of dark red roses. Finally the bride and groom, arm in arm, the Reverend Dr. Fuenderling awaiting the party at the chancel, where the nuptial knot was tied. The bride, who looked charmingly pretty and happy, was robed in white moire trimmed with chiffon and point lace; her tulle veil was confined to her coiffure by a wreath of myrtle, and her bouquet was of bridal roses and lilies of the valley. Following the church service, a very large reception was held at the home of the bride's mother on Jackson street. The presents received have been large in number, varied in character, besides being handsome and valuable, including jewels, silverware, cut glass, bric-à-brac, etc.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Lewis announce the engagement of their sister, Miss Frances Ries, and Abe Harshall. Will receive Monday, February 22nd, from 3 to 5 o'clock p. m. at 2917 Clay street.

The ceremony which united Miss Mattie Gibbs and Walter Holcombe was performed by the Rev. George Walk at the residence of the bride's parents, on Post street, on Wednesday evening, in the presence of relatives and intimate friends. The floral effects were beautiful, the various rooms were decorated with different colored blossoms, calla lilies, yellow, pink and red roses. In the evening a general reception was held, and the home was filled with friends who came to tender their congratulations. The bridal robe was a very handsome creation of rich white satin elaborately trimmed with duchesse lace. White violets and lilies of the valley composed the bridal bouquet, and orange blossoms and a diamond pin held the fleecy veil in place. Miss Harriet Gibbs, the maid of honor, was attired in white tulle over pink silk, and carried a cluster of bridesmaid's roses. Charles Beatty, of Sacramento, was the groom's best man. The presents were handsome and costly.

The wedding of Mr. Josua Eppinger and Miss Hilda Levy will take place at the Concordia Club on Tuesday evening, March second, at half past eight o'clock.

Mr. George E. Tourtillotte and Miss Kleta Shackelford were married on the 1st inst., by the Rev. C. B. Reddick, pastor of Centenary M. E. Church, South. The ceremony was very quiet, being attended only by immediate relatives, owing to recent hereavements in the bride's family.

Among recently announced engagements are those of Miss Helen Curtis and William McGee; Miss Harriet Oppenheimer and Hugo J. Lyons; and Miss Grace Sabine and Dr. R. W. M. Payne.

The most elaborate affair of the month was, beyond question, the silver wedding anniversary celebration of Mr. and Mrs. A. Roos, at the Palace Hotel, on the evening of the 14th. It was in the form of a dinner to one hundred guests, who were seated at five round tables laid in the center room of the drawing-room suite on the first floor. Each of these tables accommodated twenty guests, and were adorned with different floral decorations, No. 1 being Bermuda lilies; 2, yellow daffodils; 3, American beauty roses; 4, carnations; and 5, bridesmaid's roses. Mrs. Roos, who wore a magnificent robe of pink and silver brocaded satin and a multitude of diamonds, received her guests in the north room, which was prettily dressed with almond, apple and peach blossoms and many tasteful devices, and during the discussion of the delicious menu Baltenberg's orchestra discoursed delightful melody. The favors for the ladies were tiny silver bells engraved with the date. After dinner Mdle. Trehelli favored the guests with several selections. The sketch artists, Silver and Wyatt, and the Fletcher trio gave some of their specialties, and later there was dancing. Mrs. Roos was the recipient of an immense number of handsome gifts appropriate to the occasion from friends at home and abroad.

On Thursday evening a very charming entertainment of living pictures, music, etc., was given at Golden Gate Hall in aid of the furnishing fund of St. Paul's Episcopal Church.

Mrs. Carr's tea last Saturday was a very pleasant one, which can be said also of the tea given by Mrs. Barclay Henley for the début of her eldest daughter. The rooms were prettily decorated with violets and ferns, and a hevy of very pretty girls assisted the hostesses in looking after the large number of guests who called. In the evening the Cercle Francais gave a hall in their club rooms in Union Square Hall, and after a handsome supper, dancing was resumed, and kept up with spirit until a late hour.

Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young have returned from their trip to Europe.

Are you willing to try a new tea at our expense?

Your grocer will sell you a package of Schilling's Best, and return your money in full if you don't like it.

Prices low, but enough.

Next week, which will be the last ere Lent, is so well filled with engagements already, society will have a surfeit of good things by the time it closes. Among the many gay affairs to take place may be mentioned the dinner with which Mr. and Mrs. I. W. Helman will celebrate the natal day of the Father of his Country on Monday, to which sixty guests are bidden. On Tuesday afternoon there will be the Lady Washington tea at Mrs. W. E. Fisher's, on Sutter street, and in the evening the dance of the Winter Cotillion Club at Beethoven Hall. Friday, the 26th, is the date set for the tea which Mrs. Alexander Warner will give at her residence on Franklin street, as well as for the second of the musical soirees for the benefit of the French Christian Union of California, at the first of which, last evening, Miss Alice Ames, the violinist, made her first appearance since her return from Europe. On Saturday, the 27th, the Crocker mansion, on California street, will be thrown open once more, and a tea given for the benefit of the State Woman's Hospital. On Saturday evening the San Francisco Verein Club will give an elaborate entertainment. Mr. Greenway has his hands full preparing for the many affairs which are to mark the close of the ante-Lenten season. The arrangements for the ball which the Friday Fortnightly Club will give next Friday evening have been placed entirely under his control, and that it will be a charming success there can be no manner of doubt. The Mardi Gras bal masque of the Art Institute will be on a grand scale; the reception committee include some of the best-known people in our swim, and it is a fore-gone conclusion that all who attend will have a gloriously good time.

On the twenty-seventh of the month the Concordia Club promises its members a rare treat. A ball, preceded by a brand new burlesque is what they have on the "tapis." The "Prisoner of Zenda" has been prepared and no pains have been spared to bring it up to the members' requirements. All the music is original and much new talent has been recruited from the Club's membership, as well as outside friends. Rehearsals have been going on for some weeks past.

Among recent affairs may be mentioned the musical reception given by Miss Ardella Mills; Mrs. George Pope's young ladies' luncheon; the Ehrman bud dinner; Miss Baldwin's luncheon; Mrs. Joe Donohoe's luncheon for married ladies; Mrs. W. Magee's dinner of a dozen guests; Miss Katherine Dillon's tea in honor of Miss Alice Jordan of Santa Clara; the Misses Stubbs' euchre party, which was followed by dancing.

Mrs. F. L. Whitney will give the first of her euchre parties this afternoon; the second will take place next Saturday. Mrs. W. H. Brown's euchre party will be given on Wednesday evening next at the Occidental Hotel.

Manager Burns, of the Hotel El Paso de Robles, gave his Eastern guests an unusual treat on the 14th inst., in the shape of a delightfully served barbecue. Eighty covers were laid, and the, to the Eastern folks, unusual experience of a dinner out-of-doors in mid-winter was an occasion of much enjoyment.

The Misses Lewis, at their home corner Post and Laguna streets, entertained a few friends on Friday evening, in a novel manner. Progressive hearts was played, much to the enjoyment of those present. The game as played varied slightly from the scientific version.

The tea held at the home of Mrs. E. K. Stevenot, at 1518 Taylor street, was both a social and financial success. The entertainment was largely attended, and the antique room, filled with many rare articles, was especially interesting.

On the 23d inst., at 8 o'clock p. m., an interesting exhibition in fencing will be given at the gymnasium of the San Francisco Riding Club, 1615 Pacific avenue, under the immediate direction of Professor Tronchet, the fencing master of the club.

Judge McKenna is being feted and bauqueted extensively prior to his departure for Washington City; but greatly to the pleasure of their friends, Mrs. and Miss McKenna will delay their going Eastward for some months.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Tay left on last Tuesday for a visit to Los Angeles and San Diego. At the latter place they will attend the annual water carnival.

F. L. Brown, manager of the Washburn Moen Manufacturing Company, left on Tue-day evening for Los Angeles to attend a meeting of the Hardware and Metal Association. From Los Angeles he goes East in the interest of the company. Mr. A. L. Walker, of the same firm, has just returned from the Northwest.

In the recent life class competition at the Mont Parnasse Art School, Paris, Miss Carrie Callahan, formerly a pupil of the Hopkins' Institute, and also a member of the Sketch Club, obtained the second prize.

Notwithstanding the very disagreeable weather of the week, preparations are going forward at the Hotel Rafael for the early descent upon that excellent hostelry of a large number of the élite of the city.

On Sunday evening the Calliopean Club celebrate their thirteenth anniversary by tending the members a banquet at the Club House, 1620 California street. A novel programme is promised.

Miss Minnie Louise Schwabacher gave the second of a series of dinners on Sunday last. Pink prevailed in the table decorations which were very artistic. Covers were laid for twenty.

Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, who are expected to arrive here in about ten days, will pass the month of March at Milbrae as guests of D. O. Mills, who arrived last Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. L. S. Bachman and Miss Bachman will give a dinner party on the twenty-fifth inst., at their home.

Mrs. Gerstle will entertain her friends at tea this afternoon from four to seven.

More than half the worry and trouble of entertaining is in preparing banquets, dinners, for private parties and small functions. Max Abraham, the Caterer, 428 Geary street, will take all such cares off your hands, and attend to every such detail. His wide experience guarantees perfect satisfaction.

GOTHAM GOSSIP

WELL! the ball is over, and there were none of the threatened dynamite bombs, and the cranks did not gain admission. It was a supreme success, and hundreds of invited guests are to-day reveling in the thoughts of how more than usually stunning they were last night. A photographic studio in the neighborhood of the Waldorf was kept open all night, and at least five hundred of the guests were photographed. This adds another to the list of those who benefited by last night's lavish expenditures. The hotel, butchers, hakers, cabbies, florists, costumers, seamstresses, hair-dressers, decorators, confectioners, messengers, extra maids and footmen, and finally the photographer aforesaid, and his assistants. It means something hetter, does it not, than pauperizing by indiscriminate charity? Mr. Hermann Oelrichs, as a Dutch Burgomaster of the Sixteenth Century, was superb. Mrs. Oelrichs' statuesque beauty was pronounced, in a court dress of the time of Louis XV., a favorite epoch with many of the guests, by the way; Miss Fair was lovely in a Directoire gown. Dick Tohin was another Californian present, and Lady Cunard (Maude Burke) still another.

By the way—Mrs. Alexander was another Californian at the hall in the costume of a Venetian Court Lady of the Sixteenth Century, with her superh hair done in the style of centuries ago. Her husband wore an Oxford student's garb of the same period.

I wonder if anything will develop from the attachment of Dick Tohin and Miss Fair. He used to be known as "Dickie" and she as "Birdie" in the long ago, and judging from their attitude at the last Sunday night's concert in the Metropolitan, they might still be inclined to their more youthful names. But it is charming to meet old friends.

Her cousin, Mrs. Gillig, is leaving for England early in March, to be absent for six or seven weeks. She gives a farewell luncheon at the Waldorf on the fifteenth.

Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young are at that famous hotel, having arrived only a few days ago. "Billy" Barton has been in town for a few days and has gone back to Philadelphia.

I hear that Mrs. George Law is a guest of her sister-in-law in Florence, and that if she wishes to change her name and rank she will have no difficulty in doing so. I have also heard only to-day of "Tony" Navarro and his wife, who are living at Broadway in Somersetsire, near their intimate friends, the Alma Tachmas. They are happy in the possession of a five-months old son.

PASSE-PARTOUT.

New York, February 11, 1897.

THE exhibit of pen and ink sketches of newspaper work that is being very generously arranged by the Chronicle for the benefit of its relief fund, and which will open at the Partington School, 424 Pine street, on next Wednesday, the 24th inst., continuing the remainder of the week, promises to be an immense success. The collection of pen and ink sketches is quite a fad, and the exhibition now being prepared with the greatest care by the Chronicle will afford an opportunity to obtain excellent work of this character, and at the same time aid a most worthy charity. Admission to the exhibition will be only 25 cents. It will be a chance to enjoy one's self, get an idea of the character of work that can be done, and help the poor.

THIS TRAMP HAD READ THE BIBLE.

At one of the recent revival services held at noon in Old Epiphany Church a ragged, unkempt tramp walked in, apparently supposing it to be a charitable soup establishment. When he saw his mistake he started to go out, but was stayed by one of the evangelical workers.

"Stop with us," he said. "But the tramp persisted in going out, saying, 'I'm in de wrong place.'" "No, you're not," responded the evangelist; "we are glad to see you."

WANTED TO TRADE.

I'd like to make exchange at once, On terms extremely low, One dancing girl of queenly grace, For one who'll swim and row. I also have in stock a maid Who knows the tramp in whist; I'll trade her for a hammock girl Who wouldn't scream if kissed.

SHE'S ALL RIGHT NOW.

No doubt some little claim belongs To all these wild emotions About redressing woman's wrongs, And other modern notions; And yet it might be well, I've thought, And scarcely more inhuman, To let her wrongs all go to pot And just re-dress the woman.

An English explorer, Edward A. Fitzgerald, has set out with an elaborately equipped party to climb Acocagua, on the borders of Chili and the Argentine Republic. This mountain is 22,000 feet high, the highest peak outside of the Himalayas, and if Mr. Fitzgerald succeeds he will have climbed the highest mountain yet ascended.

Have you seen the SMOKER'S TIP? It will prevent the poisonous irritation of the tobacco upon the mouth and lip. This constant irritation has caused many a cancer. "The kiss you would impart the sweeter would be, for nicotine on the lip far less there will be."

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 27, 1897.

Number 9.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

 Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

GIVE the unemployed picks and shovels as well as knives and forks. He who wields the one has earned the right to use the other.

THE fact that American steel rails are selling in England below the possibility of competition there, is a compliment to the superior skill of American workmen and American machinery, as it is an unanswerable argument in favor of the principles of free trade.

THE Examiner and the police do not like William M. Nielson for reasons perfectly well understood. Having failed in everything else, they are taking advantage of personal troubles that are liable to occur to anybody, and are falsifying in every instance, as will appear when his side is heard.

THE real estate brokers of San Francisco are practically a unit in favor of the Torrens land transfer bill that is now before the Legislature. The bill should be made law in California without delay. It simplifies and guarantees titles as no other system devised has ever been able to do. It is absolute and complete. Failure to enact it would be a public misfortune.

FOR years Eastern fruit packers have been defrauding California canners of their rights and swindling their own customers by representing that they are buying California goods, which in reality were grown and put up in Maryland. Every effort to stop this traffic—fraudulent in a double sense—has always failed. San Francisco fruit men have just secured the conviction of four of the most flagrant violators at Baltimore. This will have a very discouraging effect upon all the Eastern swindling gang who injure the reputation of California goods by packing inferior fruit under California labels.

THE talk of good roads in California comes better late than never. Millions of money are annually wasted because of had highways throughout the State. What good roads can accomplish may be learned from the experience of Eastern States, where whole districts that were deserted, and valueless, have been made productive, populous and prosperous through the building of permanent highways. A concerted, comprehensive system, carefully planned and intelligently worked out, would be of measureless value to both city and country. Good roads are little less than the foundation of general prosperity.

THE Grand Jury is doing good work. Among other discoveries, it has found out that there was corrupt collusion between certain members of the late Board of Supervisors and certain officers of the City and County Hospital and divers contractors. As usual, it is shown that the people were robbed to the tune of several thousand dollars by some of these industrious public pick-pockets. The flagrant frauds that have been thinly covered up until this time are stalking abroad, and point their fingers toward certain well-known men. The investigation should proceed vigorously, until the takers of bribes and the robbers of the people are in person brought to bar. The money stolen is gone, but the men who took it remain, and they should pay, on prison fare, for their crimes.

PEOPLE who have watched the proceedings in the case of Mrs. Nancy A. Abbott against Thos. Quackenbush will not be surprised that Mrs. Abbott was defeated. Her fate should be a warning to elderly ladies who desire to acquire a competence by annexing the fortunes of wealthy old gentlemen by the private contract marriage route. Quackenbush made a fair, square fight, and won it. That Mrs. Abbot got justice few will doubt.

THE contractors who are accustomed to do work on the State wharves should be more careful of their figuring, and reach a better understanding before submitting their bids. A difference of $862 for a job on which the highest offer was but $1,360, clearly shows that the boys made a serious blunder in letting the public know just what a really good thing is. The old theory of addition, division and silence works quite as smoothly among pile-drivers as politicians, and it shouldn't be disturbed.

SAN FRANCISCO does not want any sociologist in the course of instruction here. There are too many rich sinecures in our public schools now to be paid for by the people. A little less so-called education, and more common horse-sense is what taxpayers of this city want. Instead of adding to the long list of tax-eaters that have been fastening from time to time on our public school system, with all the folderol uselessness of them, we want the pruning knife, not the lengthening pay-roll. The bill against which a prompt protest has gone to Sacramento, means $4,000 per annum added to the tax roll without an additional advantage amounting to four cents a year. San Francisco wants none of it.

THE ordinance that was adopted on Tuesday by the Supervisors, imposing a penalty of $25 or ten days' imprisonment for spitting on the sidewalks, in public conveyances, or within buildings, will be hailed with joy by all ladies and gentlemen. Should the Board of Health, which recommended the passage of this act, do nothing further during its term of office worthy of commendation, the members by this deed alone will have earned their salaries and the gratitude of the city. The ordinance will hard pinch the hummers—the foul-smelling gangs that hang about the City Hall and make one vast cuspidor of its corridors. It will also catch the Market-street statuary. We hope the police will strictly enforce the provisions of this ordinance, showing no mercy to the offenders against health and decency. Cleanliness is next to godliness, and in this respect San Francisco is a long way from a state of piety.

THE officers of the Horse Show Association of the Pacific Coast have sent out a circular to all horse breeders, and others interested, plainly indicating that there is required a more general and hearty interest in the work of the Association. The gentlemen whose names have been prominently identified with the horse show have not only given their time, but their money as well, toward its success, and they feel that more practical approval of the Association and its objects is necessary upon the part of breeders and exhibitors. California produces the best horses in the world, as the track records of the country show, and it is here that the strongest inducements should be found and the most successfully-conducted horse shows given. The officers have been untiring in their efforts to make the Association of practical value to all classes interested. It is time that breeders throughout the Coast should be heard from. Assurances of their hearty cooperation are due to these gentlemen.

THE POLICE IN CHINATOWN.

THE police gathered in some three hundred Chinamen the other night for playing the comparatively innocent game of fan tan. There is a city ordinance against it, which renders the players liable to a small fine. It is a fair and square game of chance, but, being gambling, it is properly under the ban of the law. Yet it is played year in and year out in Chinatown, without the slightest molestation from any quarter. It is said the gambling houses pay from $10 to $25 a week for police protection and usually get it. Why then was that raid made the other night? In the first place, people have been talking rather freely about police inactivity in Chinatown since the death of Little Pete, and it had become necessary to make a showing. In the next place, quite a number of the gambling houses have for some time, on the plea of hard times, been escaping, wholly or in part, the payment of the customary dues. It was deemed a good time to give them the shaking up they got. Thus two birds were killed with one stone. Clever Police! Immaculate defenders of the law! There will be almost as many fan tan games played in Chinatown to-night as ever, but there will be no arrests made. The opium joints, attended by white girls, have not been disturbed, nor have the houses of shame visited by the same class. It is possible to do a mighty lot of thinking on these points.

Since the foregoing was put in type two singularly significant events have occurred in Chinatown that verify to the fullest extent the statements of the NEWS LETTER in regard to the traffic in white women being the real bone of contention between the late Little Pete's faction and the See Yups. Little Pete in some way had the monopoly of importing Chinese women, often selling them at from $2,500 to $3,000. At that figure they were, of course, valuable chattel property. The income they brought their owners may be estimated from their capital value. This monopoly Little Pete held on to the last, and it never seemed more firmly established or more profitable than at the time of his death. By some occult arrangements with the Customs Department he had little difficulty in getting in his own, and shutting out those of his opponents. It was a monopoly as lucrative as it was unspeakable. That it could exist in this civilized community has been alike disgraceful to the Municipal and Federal Governments. Certain Missionary homes have, in this connection, sown where they have not listed, and have corralled white wives, and worse, for Chinese merchants. The so-called "house to house visitations" have converted girl missionary teachers to opium fiends, decoy ducks, and we hesitate to say what else. This matter is almost too painful for investigation, but the bottom facts will have come out all the same. We now learn how great a figure the See Yups make of their white slaves against those of the Little Pete Tong. No fewer than five leading lawyers have been employed to keep the Little Pete's from getting in and competing with women of our own race. Shame upon our authorities!

How accustomed the See Yups have become to familiarity with white women has just been demonstrated in the persistence with which a Chinaman has been way-laying an estimable American lady and attempting to kiss her. He was very properly arrested, and if he had lived down South he would be lynched. If this thing comes close to our homes and hearths, we shall probably have greater toleration for Southern lynching. It is a bad business anywhere, but that is a worse business that renders it possible, and even tolerable in the eyes of the freest people on Earth. There are certain portions of Chinatown known to the police that are crowded every day with white visitors to opium joints, and to dens of debauchery worse than the Chinese women occupy. It is now a question as to which of the two classes of women shall win the Chinese men. It is a condition that should make the very blood of our race boil. It is a depth of degradation from which every impulse of humanity recoils in utter horror. Heads of respectable families little dream of the places in which this evil has taken root. It is terrible that these things exist, but the evidence is clear and the necessity for action obvious. The Police could stamp it out if they would. Public opinion, which is the ultimate Court, after all is said and done, should be aroused, and these monstrous evils strangled to their final death.

"As to Boycotting The Examiner." The Examiner is the authority—not a very good one, however—for the statement that it is being boycotted by people who do not like it, and it thinks that among those people are to be found stockholders in street car companies, the gas company, Spring Valley, and the railroads. Well, it is a bad rule that does not work both ways. We have seen no outward and visible signs of boycotting our shameless contemporary, except among heads of families who are beginning to realize the harmful nature of many of its unspeakable ways, but we have failed to learn of any systematic boycotting on the part of the stockholders in the various public utilities that have lately been the objects of the Examiner's bitter warfare. Of these things we are certain: (1) That retaliation upon the Examiner has long been deserved; (2) that it would prove a very effective weapon against a newspaper that bids its soul in exchange for the nickels of the crowd, (3) that rendering material support to one's enemy is about like turning the other cheek to be smitten. If a newspaper does its level best to destroy invested capital, that capital certainly has the right to protect itself by destroying its enemy, if it can. Self-protection is the first law of nature. If invested capital ceases to deal with the Examiner, or with anybody who does, it would soon find a safer way of tickling its mob. It knows the boycott would be effective, hence its crying out before it is hurt. It is likely to be taken at its word, and the hint passed around.

The latest trick of our contemporary to catch nickels is to establish a monopoly of prize-ring news. Money has been paid for the exclusive publication of all that the principals, seconds, and hangers-on may choose to give out, and they, in turn, are bound to give nothing out, except to the Examiner. This is what we are told is "the new journalism." It appears to be part of the contract that the fight is to be "boomed" to the exclusion of legitimate news. Of course, the pugs pay for all they are entitled to get it, but what are those to do who like not prize-fighting, or any of its ways? If they subscribe for the Examiner they are directly subsidizing brutality and those who engage in it. It is in the air that this fight is fixed, and that Corbett is to win. We have no evidence that Fitzsimmons is a party to such an arrangement, but when he fraternizes with the people of the Examiner who were responsible for Umpire Earp, and the fizzle that resulted, he does about the best he can for betting—that is to kill it. No man, not a fool, will wager a dime on his winning. If his fellow Cornishmen of Gold Hill and Virginia City are crazy enough to bet on a certain loser because of his nativity, they deserve to be bled, as they will be. The Examiner is now a monopolist itself. It has, or thinks it has, a corner on the news of the coming prize-fight. The encounter is against the law of this State, and the popularizing of it ought to be made so also. A self-respecting man would view the intent of the law and govern himself accordingly. Fancy the boasted palladium of our liberties, and censor of public morals, crowing at having become the copyrighted monopolist of prize-ring news! Fathers and mothers will boycott it anyhow.

Cuba and Spain. There appears no reason why the United States should accept any other than the position of mediator between Spain and Cuba, notwithstanding the general clamor from noisy statesmen and unthinking citizens. The stories of Spain's atrocities in the island are one-sided, unfair, and false. In this we may thank a sensational and unreliable press, which stamps all information coming from Spanish sources as lies, and all rebel reports as truths. The fact that naturalized citizens of the republic should engage in any transaction whereby the country's peace should be seriously disturbed, is treasonable, and justly brings such violator within the range of Spanish punishment.

There are two causes for the rabid jingo attacks in the United States Congress. Primarily, the situation has been forced upon the blatant Senators by financial circles having interests or mortgages in Cuba, and upon its plantations. Secondly, many of the jingoes have trumpeted the Cuban cause, with a desire to show their spleen against President Cleveland and his Cabinet. Not one of the charges made against Spain or against Mr. Cleveland in the premises can be substantiated. No Government in a Republican sense exists on the island of Cuba. True, there is a sort of administration, but that this power can show the requisite stability to afford it due recognition has not yet been proved. Even if the revolution and its adherents win their cause, it is very doubtful if any assimilation of racial features could be a fact. White and mulatto residents of Cuba do not love the black race. They are fighting the battles of the revolution, and if victorious would demand recognition, but it is doubtful if they would receive that demand. It has long been known to the best friends of "Cuba Libre" that difference of opinion exists between the black contingent and the whites of Spanish and foreign origin, as to the settlement of matters. The present military chief, Maximo Gomez, is not a Cuban, and is just as likely now to pursue the course that he did during a previous revolt—namely, to treat with Spain for a monetary consideration. Indeed, he is even now fighting for money.

Humanity is a great power to invoke in this contest, but Europe so far has not betrayed this virtue in the Cuban cause, for the reason that Spain's victory means security for payment of interest on Cuban bonds, and so long as the war continues Germany can dump beet root sugar into this and other countries hitherto supplied by Cuba with the sweet material.

So far as Cuba ever becoming a State or territory of this Republic, it is but a dream. Her people, in their racial peculiarities, their born prejudice against the Anglo-Saxon race, their customs and manners, are foreign to us and our ideas. There are hundreds of Cubans, well educated and outwardly desirous of union, but deep down in their hearts and natures lies that feeling that every member of the Latin race bears towards the Anglo-Saxon. They know they cannot get along without the help of that race, and therefore are polished and courteous when it suits their purpose, but once give them the opportunity, and all the racial prejudice appears.

Let the United States intervene by offering mediation in the matter, but to fight Spain upon the strength of exaggerated newspaper stories and fanciful, untruthful statements relative to cruel practices is utterly out of the question. Mr. M. H. de Young, in a recently published interview, stated concisely "that there was enough matters of importance affecting United States interests to be considered by Congress and the Executive, to occupy attention before going into the Cuban matter." This is a true statement of the question, and it is to be hoped that some of our citizens will give heed to this enunciation, and not be beguiled into devoting their time and attention to matters of which they have but one-sided information.

Hawaiian Annexation. The Bulletin takes exception to our assertion of last week in these columns, that the fact that the United States has flourished without distant naval outposts, is an argument that we do not need them now. Our evening contemporary's illustration of the "boy in knickers" is amusing, but not "conclusive." We might reply that the boy may not feel the need of whiskey, but if he grows up among certain associations, he is very liable to feel it, and yet not have an especially desirable sensation. The value of strategic outposts and numerous coaling stations is cheerfully admitted in the case of a nation bent on colonization or conquest, but we were arguing from the premise that it is desirable for the United States to continue the policy of neutrality and defense. Again, the question of "control" of the islands which the Bulletin advances, may have some value. We were not speaking of control, but of annexation. It is entirely possible to enjoy the former without burdening ourselves with the latter. Indeed, we have a fair measure of control now. It gave us coaling rights at Pearl Harbor which we believe have been neglected or allowed to lapse. But suppose we have a coal station in the islands, what security would it be against a power like Great Britain driving us "worth or south for coal supply?" And how would the fact prevent the same power from shelling San Francisco from the three mile limit? While we have our hand in, let us point out a few more reasons why annexation would be folly. If the islands should come into the possession of the United States what would be their destiny? The spirit of American institutions and our traditions answer that they must be given statehood and endowed with self-government of a republican form. That would add to our galaxy a new State, which according to the island census just completed, would comprise a population of 109,020. About 40,000 of this number are Kanakas from the various Pacific islands; about 60,000 are made up of Japanese, Chinese and Portuguese; and about 7,000 are divided between Americans, English, Germans and French. The American colony is less than one half of the white population, and is less than one-fiftieth of the whole. Is not that a vivid picture of the very poorest material from which to form an American State? We are still withholding statehood from Arizona, which has more than ten times as many native Americans, and from New Mexico, which has fifty times as many. Why should we concede the precious boon to foreigners—and such foreigners? Its consummation would invite one of two equally unfortunate conditions. Either the creation of another American State, governed by the ultra foreign notions of a people just emerging from barbarism, or a State ruled by a minority which from its very nature would be split by factional strife. In name the islands are now republican, but they admit themselves it cannot last. Less than one-fiftieth of the population have the instinct of free government. Hon. John W. Foster whose opportunities of knowing are numerous and extensive, says they cannot govern themselves for any length of time owing to the clash of discordant elements classified as republicans, royalists, natives and foreigners. The climate is a foe to the Anglo-Saxon and will prevent a great increase of their numbers. Commercial advantages will not be increased except in the interest of a few planters. The situation of the islands makes their trade naturally tributary to the United States. Nature and not the form of government will control that. To put the question of annexation to a popular vote in the islands would undoubtedly defeat it. To annex them without consent, would be in the nature of a conquest inimical to the traditions of the Republic—a conquest without advantage, and a constant source of weakness.

The truth is, that the little clique of expatriated Americans have undertaken a contract too great for their capital, and are anxious to shift the burden to the broad shoulders of Uncle Samuel, while they stand ready to gather the plums of business and retain the emoluments of office.

Is It A New Departure? The aged chief of the detective branch of the Police Department of this city said in a published interview the other day that there was nothing new, or out of the way, in his appearance and activity in the Cooney case. That, no doubt, is true. The prosecution is rich, and able to pay well for good services. But the Captain went on to say that "he was no respecter of persons and that the humblest and poorest would just as readily secure his services. It was his duty to ferret out crime whenever due complaint is made to him." That is a correct definition of his duty as a public officer, and if he is now living up to it, a knowledge of the fact will bring him such a host of friends as every man likes to have in his old age. When the police force is a protection to innocent men, and a terror to evil doers, be they rich or poor, that force is sure to be respected by good and law-abiding citizens. On the other hand, when it is made a machine for oppression by those who can pay for it, it becomes the most dangerous and hated instrumentality a city can be cursed with.

Will The Powers Stop Greece? The Turks, may, by grace of the Great Powers, who prefer the wholesale massacre of men, women, and children of their own race and religion, rather than risk a war that civilized men everywhere would welcome, yet it will cost those Powers dearly not to help Greece, or their people. England, Italy, France, and even Germany are treading upon dangerous ground when they run counter to the passionate and well settled opinion of their people. Englishmen simply will not tolerate their ships being used to blockade Greece for the benefit of Turkey. Italy is almost frantic on the subject. France declines to follow her ministers, and even the German people, cautious as they are, are firm in letting Emperor William understand the situation and in declaring that not a German gun shall be fired with the purpose of returning Crete to Turkey. That island long looked to Greece as the Mother Country, her independence has been won, and her annexation is an accomplished fact. The concert of European nations may be great, but the concert of European opinion is greater. The people have willed that Crete shall be free, and their decree will prove final. The opinion in regard to the ultimate fate of Macedonia is strong, but it may possibly moderate for a time, for the difficulties of the hour are formidable. Yet in the end Macedonia will become one of the most valued and loyal of Greek provinces.

Meanwhile, the Powers want to keep Greece back, but the brave people and noble King seem to have cast fear to the wind and determined to fight and take the consequences, whatever they may be. Things wonderfully clear away before firmness. The Powers are impotent simply because they are not firm. They Shall—I—Shall—I with almost all questions and succeed in settling none. To-day they will, and to-morrow they will not. Every thing by turns, but nothing long, they are afraid of each other, and are in earnest about nothing, except a dislike of fighting. But the destined changes in the map of Europe will go on all the same. Turkey will be pushed out of Europe, where she has long been out of place, and find a more congenial home in Asia. The Mahammedans are still all her own, and they are numerous throughout her possessions in Asiatic Turkey. Greece, under King George, has made a degree of progress that is bound to grow and expand. Finally the popular royal family will govern the whole of ancient Greece. Her present strength lies in the force of European public opinion.

Help for the Deserving. The movement of prominent citizens in aid of the unemployed, must commend itself to all classes of people, and the action of those who are in need of aid in thus eagerly accepting the opportunity for earning a living, shows that they are worthy of prompt and adequate aid. San Francisco has been the scene of so many labor agitations, so many wild and impracticable demands upon the part of the jaw-laboring unemployed that it is refreshing to find those who are in need of aid willing to back up their demands by the sweat of their faces. San Francisco is a city of abundant wealth and generous impulses. There surely will be found no disposition upon the part of substantial citizens to withhold their aid to this movement for practical help of the deserving, who only ask the opportunity to help themselves.

The expenditure of money upon a boulevard oceanward, and along the beach from the Park, will result in a permanent improvement of value. A public improvement that will be enjoyed by all classes, and worthy of the economical outlay necessary to its completion, entirely aside from the primary object of its accomplishment—the relief of distress among the honest unemployed. For these two objects—either one of which should be sufficient to command respectful consideration—there should be no difficulty in rolling up a sum sufficient to feed the one and permanently build the other. As the matter has been taken hold of by practical business men, its accomplishment is assured.

Chinatown Views. With this issue of the NEWS LETTER appears the first of a series of interesting views of Chinatown. There has been a very general request for these pictures, which in themselves will give a history of this most remarkable part of our city's life. The fame of Chinatown is almost as wide as that of San Francisco itself; for no stranger ever comes here without visiting this city within a city—a little Chinese world within an American metropolis. Here, all the habits, customs, and peculiarities of the Chinaman are seen as they have been kept and observed by the children of Confucius for thousands of years. In himself, a Chinaman is always a Chinaman, without regard to climate, conditions, or countries. In San Francisco, the conditions have been favorable to the establishment of homes, and observance of rites dear to the hearts of all Chinese. Nowhere, outside of their native land, can be found such a colony as exists in the Chinatown of this city. These pictures will embrace a wide range of views, both interior and exterior, and will in themselves give an excellent idea of this noted part of the Pacific's chief business center. When completed, the views will form a valuable collection—more especially as the Chinatown of to-day fortunately bids fair to disappear from the map of San Francisco within a few years.

The Legislature of Many Attaches. Every successive Legislature seems doomed to be branded with its own special infamy, but the sin common to them all is that of stealing. We have had the Legislatures of "a thousand drinks," of "a thousand scandals," of "the combine," of "the robber's roost," and now we have one of many attachés. To open the session, preparatory to organization in the Assembly, alone required over one hundred and twenty attachés, or two to every member. The Clerk was required to appoint whomsoever members dictated, and it resulted that persons were put on the pay-roll who never visited the Capitol at all, yet members with powers of attorney in their pockets signed for their pay, which went where the powers of attorney were. No wonder that members voted to exonerate the Clerk: some of them had had "a part of the pig." Some twelve hundred proposed measures have been introduced this session, two-thirds of which are obviously "cinch bills." It is wonderful what discoveries members make about session time. They find that almost every interest that has money in it needs to be "regulated." If the daily press displayed, in this connection, the enterprise it vaunts itself so much over, this bad business could be rendered too odious for general practice. The NEWS LETTER alone, some years ago, discovered and named "the robber's roost," told of its purposes, its wine, women, and faro, and for a time actually brought legislative proceedings to a standstill. The Examiner this session is denouncing certain bills, and favoring others, that may well cause its readers to yearn for the bottom facts. Rumor is at fault, or certain of those facts will be got at yet.

More Tariff for More Revenue. The Government statistics for December last show that the receipts exceeded the expenditures by $2,044,449, so that the prediction of President Cleveland that the Wilson tariff would in a short time produce all the revenue required, seems in course of being fulfilled. It would have done that anyhow, but for the unexpected knocking out of the income tax by the Supreme Court. To wipe out the deficit on the whole year by reducing expenditures is both impossible and undesirable, says Chairman Dingley. The cry is for both more tariff and more revenue. But every proposition made during the hearings had before the House Committee tended to reduce or prohibit importations, and hence to reduce customs revenue, and to increase the deficit. It will be interesting to know when the subject of more revenue is to be considered, especially as the new tariff is to be cut and dried, and ready for acceptance at the extra session. If the present Congress were to add a dollar a barrel to the beer tax, the price to the consumer would not be enhanced, the necessary revenue would be raised, and an extra session avoided. But then political debts must needs be paid. The protected industries put up an enormous campaign fund, as Mark Hanna has good reason to know, and, of course, whatever was nominated in the bond must be fulfilled. Hence the President-elect must begin his term with "Congress on his hands," and with it, and the new batch of Senators, his ways may not all be rendered pleasant, nor his paths made peaceful. The desire of the country undoubtedly is for rest and quiet.

For the Carnival. It is none too early for the work begun last fall for a week's carnival in this city to be taken up again and vigorously pushed forward. It is unfortunate that the burden of the unemployed is upon the city, and that the demands of charity have been so heavy at a time of business depression; but the carnival, viewed from a strictly mercantile standpoint, should be regarded as a most promising business investment. It is bound to bring a large number of people here, will add hundreds of thousands of dollars to local circulation which will be felt in every business channel, besides proving of great benefit as an advertisement of San Francisco and the whole State. Thousands of strangers from all over the Coast, and the East as well, will visit the city upon that occasion, and they will be the most desirable class of people—people of means and intelligence. Vigorous and united effort will be necessary to produce results at once creditable and profitable.

AT THE CAPITOL.

SACRAMENTO, February 25, 1897.

THE Legislature is on its last legs, so to speak, but instead of adjourning March 4th, which would be the sixtieth day of the session, it will probably be the 13th before the session adjourns sim die. With this Legislature, as with all past ones, the people of the State will join in grateful thanks at its none too soon ending.

The strike in the State Printing Office really availed nothing. If the State Printer and his misguided advisers had done as suggested by the Governor some weeks ago, the deficiency bill would have passed, been signed, and there would have been no strike. Now the Republican majority have acceded to the Governor's demands, and the strikers have all gone back to work. An appropriation of $40,000 will be made for legislative printing. For the rest of the fiscal year the State Printer will have to get along as best he can, unless the bill appropriating $35,000 more passes.

The bill now before the Legislature compelling foreign insurance companies to deposit $200,000 in the United States before they can do business in California, is opposed on the following grounds, although it has passed the Senate. For instance, there are forty-seven companies in San Francisco who wrote $1,237,157 of marine insurance in 1896. Of these the twenty-eight companies that would be affected by this bill wrote $616,617. They have paid losses of $366,558. Not one of them has evaded or defaulted payment of claims, but they had up no deposit. The fact that these companies wrote almost half the business shows that they have the confidence of the people, and that they paid all claims shows that they deserve this confidence. If they were unworthy and unreliable, the fact would have been shown long ago. To drive them out would result in a practical monopoly of marine insurance in the hands of those remaining. Thus it is seen that the proposed legislation would afford no greater protection than is now enjoyed, but on the contrary, would create a monopoly that would react directly upon the people whom this proposed act affects to protect. It cuts against the insured both ways.

An able orator, a bright, understanding and genial gentleman is Senator John J. Boyce, who represents the counties of Ventura and Santa Barbara, which comprise the Thirty-fifth Senatorial District. For one term Senator Boyce was City Attorney of Santa Barbara City, and filled the position so acceptably that he was chosen by the people District Attorney of the county in 1882. With an apparent fusion majority of 750 or more votes against him, Mr. Boyce was, because of his great personal popularity, elected Senator last November by a majority of nearly 200. His own county gave him 300 majority, 150 more than that of the electoral ticket. No mistake was made in the election of Senator Boyce, and no more capable, honest, and hardworking representative is in the Senate. His personal popularity at home is echoed here at Sacramento, for one can't help liking and admiring the man if you but know him. Mr. Boyce is particularly anxious to make the kindergartens part of the Public School system, and has introduced bills which he is vigorously urging, the passage of which have this idea for their purpose. He is chairman of the very important Committee on Education and Public Morals, and a member of the Committees on Counties and County Boundaries; Judiciary; Labor and Capital; Mines, Drainage and Mining Debris, and State Prisons and Prison Buildings. Although Senator Boyce has hardly been well a day since the present session began, he is seeming tireless in his labor, and worthy of the greatest amount of praise for the faithful work he has done.

Assemblyman McLauren has been unseated, and the Democratic minority is one less. J. D. Kelsey is the successful contestant. The minority made a hard but unsuccessful fight for McLauren.

With the defeat of his "2½ or 3-cent" car-fare bill, Senator Sammy Braumhart has retired from public notice. It is galling to Sammy, but hugely relished by his numerous acquaintances. Sammy's Congressional aspirations have been horribly rebuffed.

Now that the State Mineralogist has been appointed, the politicians are anxiously awaiting the Governor's expression of a choice regarding the successor of Harbor Commissioner Cole. There are plenty of aspirants, but it looks as if a dark horse will get the prize. Peg.

THE CHRONICLE'S RELIEF FUND EXHIBIT.

THE exhibition of daily newspaper pictorial art given by the Chronicle in aid of its relief fund, at 424 Pine street, during the last four days of the present week, and which closes to-night, is being well attended. The exhibition in itself is a most interesting and instructive illustration of black and white work by the cleverest newspaper artists in the United States. Representatives from the great Eastern dailies, notably the New York Herald, Press, and World, Philadelphia Ledger, Chicago Tribune, Journal, and News, Denver, St. Louis, and other papers, and lastly, but equal to the best, the San Francisco Chronicle papers. The sketches are the originals from which the pictures that have appeared in those papers from time to time were made. As the daily paper is a history of contemporaneous doings, so these sketches are interesting features of the great events of the past year or so, done in black and white—many of them most artistic. The collection embraces every subject, and even a partial account of its wide variety would be out of the question. To pick out the best, where all are so meritorious, would be a difficult task, but it is a matter of local pride to truthfully say that the work shown by the Chronicle is quite as good as the best. Altogether it is unique, and is a tribute to the skill of the newspaper artists of the country. The sketches of the different papers were donated to the exhibition, and will be sold for the benefit of San Francisco's poor. The exhibit comprises more than one thousand of these pen and ink sketches, with an occasional wash drawing, and affords an instructive illustration of what may be done in black and white. It is a credit to the Chronicle in particular, as its substantial results will be a blessing to the needy in this city.

A TREMENDOUS pecuniary significance is attached to Mr. Herne and his play—both appeal to that joy and sole support of the theatre manager, the average playgoer. At the same time, this prosperity and popularity are of such quaint unobtrusiveness that even professional play-makers and dilettante dramatists, and public journalists and private litterateurs, and all shades of dramatic critics and other superior persons, will find little to sneeze at with the scornful nose. Shore Acres is the most simple and usual of stage stories, shorn of complications, abbreviated in the hero and the heroine, and enlarged upon in the side-light character—Mr. Herne's part of Nathaniel Berry. It is set down in the dull, distinctive local colors of a life real to one-half of the nation by personal participation and observation, and almost as real to the other half through dialect magazines. And yet it seems to be an absolute novelty on the American stage. And why? Ask the nearest man, and he will answer, "Realism! Here we get Nature on the stage—no superfluous dramatics, no strain for what the critics call 'construction,' nothing hut Nature in Nature's natural way." At least that is the gist of what several men and two women said to me. I tried to explain that they were doing Mr. Herne injustice, that he was an accomplished theatricalist, that his play was artful play-making, aimed broadside at the vulnerable point of the audience, that he furnished the apparatus and they supplied the illusion—but somehow I never got a chance to finish. No one wanted to find out that Herne is clever, and that he is just as theatrical in writing a play which, by all the canons of play-making is not a play, as is William Gillette in acting a part in a manner which, by all the guns, swords and pistols of criticism, is not play-acting at all. It is a sensational imitation of the common, or garden variety, of humanity, and the success of it lies in its well-arranged exaggeration of the commonplace. Mr. Howells has tried the same thing himself many times, but his commonplace was not common enough, and his realism lacked the sunny alloy of idealism, and he was not always quite clever enough in submerging his own cleverness. Herne obliterates the stigma of authorship: he insists on your disremembering that he or any one else wrote the play—that it is a play—that it is on a stage—that is played by plain, live actors. And nearly everybody believes him. As for myself, I was aghast during the first two acts. There were my old friends, the villager hero and lover, the coerced heroine, her cruel father with his sordid money scheme, and the villain suitor he would force his daughter to wed, and the heroine's large, flabby, amiable mother, and the good, quaint, character uncle, and the funny old character man, and the whole family of them, children and all. And they were all disguised to the point of living, breathing people. Oh, the detail of them! The dialect! the exquisite arrangement of everything, from the children who did not make speeches about God and the angels, to dark-browed poppa, who really carved the real turkey. And there was a mortgage and a false accusation of crime, and the indignant heroine eloping with the heroic accused. But how changed! how different! how repressed! how artful! At the end of the second act, I would have sworn that the crafty hand of Herne could lend probability to a Henry Arthur Jones melodrama. At the end of the third, I thought Jones had better remain as Jonesful as he is. Shore Acres is lamentable only when it is in warm action. It is too staid, too pacific, too venerable for that spirit in the third act. It falters, and hobbles, and loses respectability and dignity in the lighthouse episode. Herne lacks the vital vulgarity for obvious heroics, just as he lacks the psychological expert's touch when he tries to get beneath the skin of things. Witness the good brother telling the bad brother of how he, too, loved the bad brother's wife, years ago, before she was wedded, hut turned away, as a good brother should, and sacrificed himself. It takes an Ibsen or a Grundy to handle such high explosive as this. Herne's craft is photographic: he finds his own in the quiet expression of externals. The sudden lurch into nineteenth century melodrama in the third act merely proves that while Mr. Herne may be the parent of Nature, it is a wise father who knoweth his own grandchild.

* * *

Herne does not try to be active and imaginative in the concluding act. He goes back to the suggestive tableau and the cadenced dialect, and the dramatist's trusty friend, the period of time "elapsed." I think it is fifteen months that "elapse" between the third and fourth acts, and it takes all that time and a portion of the fourth act to get the erring hrother back into focus. It is done, very neatly, and with all the simplicity of Christopher Columbus's up-turned egg. The roof is sagging under its weight of mortgage, the good brother and the bad hrother do not speak as they pass by, hard times are come, the hoom has failed to strike the town-lots on Shore Acres farm—even the choice site containing mother's grave remains unpurchased. It snows without; withiu it is Christmas eve. Uncle Nat heams with expectancy. All the time incomparable detail is taking place. Then Uncle Nat peers out into the night. You know what he sees, everybody this side of the lights knows, everybody on the stage is told, everybody except dreary, pre-repentant hrother. Uncle Nat goes out quietly, and comes back to the kitchen with something long and soft and white held preciously in his arms. It is a baby, come all the way from Chicago with its poppa and momma (the hero who did not believe in hell outside of New England, and the heroine, who learned the same opinions). Momma and poppa do not wear rich clothes; poppa's are shiny in the seams and haggly at the knees, and momma's are neat, hut not modish. Invention pales before such camera art as this. And he who was a had hrother and a cruel father is welcomed by the prodigals and allowed to repent. The hero and heroine do not lift the mortgage. Uncle Nat's back pension money arrives at the fatal moment. And when all else have gone to their heds, Uncle Nat sits alone in the hig kitchen, dreaming drowsily, and saying never a word—yet you hear it all clearer than words. And when he fastens the doors and pats the children's presents, wiuds the clock, then climbs the creaking stair, and passes out, leaving a full thirty seconds of empty stage before the curtain falls, I feel a something of the same admiration for James A. Herne's stage technic that I feel for Henry Irving's in that wonderful moment when Shylock leaves the court room.

* * *

Oh! I forgot another great point: the villain-suitor is not a real villain. He hehaves very handsomely in the last act. In fact, he kisses the heroine's baby.

* * *

The acting calls for no criticism that I can see. With the exception of that of the heroine, acted by a young woman of large and unpleasant elocutionary resources, it belongs to the play.

* * *

Shore Acres is inevitable. Possibly you did not see the opening, maybe you will not go to-night, and you may have other things on hand for to-morrow—but you will be there sooner or later. This is your foredoom. The play has the long, strong, popular pull. Personally, I cannot remember how it feels not to have seen Shore Acres. It came to the Baldwin Monday night, and already it wears the belated reliability of a classic. Some things (young critics, for instance) acquire age, some get it gratuitously; others are horn aged. So was Shore Acres. History is fairy fabrication beside the staunch New England authenticity of this five-year-old play; and Uncle Josh, once honored, beloved, and ever pledged, is now a hewhiskered fad, out-Whitcomhed at every turn. Primeval American pie, pristine turkey (stuffed) and the archaic laughter and tears of virgin Nature are in Mr. Herne's homely hut heartfelt play. As Mr. Howells recently said of Mr. Gillette—because he did not think of it in time for Mr. Herne—"In any case he has given us a drama which tingles with Americanism, and which we cannot see without fancying ourselves a nation, if not a race." But then, remember Mr. Howells is a very young dramatic critic, and he has always been an inveterate author of things himself. Modest persons like ourselves would never stop this side of a race in dealing with praise to Herne and America. I see not only a race, but all the diffusing and infusing vitality of tribal dialects in a people who can produce a Shore Acres. Such things were never literary realities before, they were but shadowed prophecies. Whitcomb Riley, of the Hoosier Harmony, and Ambrose Bierce of the Little Johnneologism, are dim and spurious dialecticians beside James A. Herne and his coast of Maine vocabulary. Herne is no kin to his harbingers. Like Sardou's Napoleon, he is not a descendant, he is an ancestor.

Tireless Fanny Rice is again at the Columbia with her moralistic little skit At The French Ball. Miss Rice's voice seems to have lost much of its fierce power; her acting is as copious and enduring as ever. Charley D'ew has several minutes of genuine cleverness, but a Mr. Gaillard (the rest of his name is not on the programme) in the part of a French roue, scoops in all the glory of the ball scene. Do not be diverted from Gaillard by the rattle and bang of the rest of the farce. There are real character and art in his work.

The band played and Sousa acted, and everyone was pleased at the California Thursday night. There was new music and old, old gestures and new, and I even thought I detected a new medal or two on John Philip's plethoric bosom and some new strands in his dusky Æolian whisker. He is a great bandmaster, our sumptuous Sousa—even if he does play the Lohengrin prelude in rhythmic martial measure. Of course the classics are not always to be joked with, and the long-haired devotees of the beautiful, the wondrous and the pure naturally regard Sousa as a musical infidel. But there is a coarse vaudeville streak somewhere in me that answers to his humor. I think his phrasing is often the summit of wit, and in his own works the instrumentation runs in epigrams. I admire Sousa as an actor, and I admire him as a musician, and, as I have said before, and say again for the lack of better expression, those brave marches of his make soldiers of us all.

ASHTON STEVENS.

It is to the Tivoli that most of us owe our acquaintance with the inimitable satires of Gilbert and Sullivan. And unless the grosser comicality of farce and burlesque has spoiled the public taste for such exquisite expression of wit and melody, there will be prosperity and entertainment all round in this revival of Gilbert and Sullivan operas. Patience opened the season this week, and many of the parts are excellently taken, and the orchestra and chorus are exceptionally satisfying. Next week The Mikado will be staged to the full extent of the Tivoli's resources.

Only one new turn at the Orpheum this week, and the best part of that is Barney Fagan's singing of "O Those Colored Ladies;" Fagan gets the real swing of the fancy nigger into his song. Here is the brilliant outlook for next week: The Waterbury Brothers and Tenny, said to be the funniest musical comedians in the business, and Dudley Prescott, "the human brass band," alleged to imitate everything that ever made a noise.

It will not do to miss Thursday's symphony concert at the Columbia. Listen to what is announced for the programme: Brahms's symphony, No. 4, in E minor (first time in San Francisco); the Roman Carnival overture, by Berlioz; the Hansel and Gretel fantasia, which made such an impression when Hinrichs brought it out at the Tivoli, and—Trebelli will sing. The chance to hear a first-class orchestra and a first-class soloist at the same concert is too rare to overlook.

Two other musical events to be anticipated pleausrably are Trebelli's song recitals, which take place at Golden Gate Hall on next Saturday afternoon and the evening of Tuesday following. Trebelli is an artist with a brilliant present and a scintillating future. Her first concert at the California captured the critics and the audience, and doubtless her singing at the Columbia, Thursday afternoon, will be the means of drawing the entire symphony contingent to her recitals.

Shore Acres has two weeks more at the Baldwin.

THE JEWS AND THE BIBLE.

[In Two Papers.—Part First.]

BY DR. G. A. DANZIGER.

THESE are, running wild in this world of ours, a few mistaken ideas about the Jews, which to set aright is a duty. The Jews have had a sufficiency of laudation and damnation, neither of which was really deserved. The fact that they are liberal patrons of Col. Ingersoll's trite lectures gave rise to the idea that all Jews are infidels. It was reasoned thus: Disinclined to believe the myths of the Old Testament, and unwilling to accept the New, they hail infidelity with delight. While the cogency is adequate, the reason lacks the elements of perfect truth. He Jew needs neither myths nor dubious history to give his religion vitality, flexibility and durability. Not being commanded to believe but to do he is a subjective religious factor and not an objective one. Peccable in the ways of the world, he is impeccable in his relation to his God—the Jew is one with his religion; he is not an infidel.

Another class of people reasons differently. The Jews must of necessity believe every statement of the Old Testament, for they even now persistently reject Christ, expecting the coming of a Messiah as promised by the Prophets. But if they do not believe in the old dispensation, why not accept the new? If they do not care for the angry Jehovah, why not embrace the love of Christ? If they fail to do as reason and logic demand of them, then forsooth, they are Jews still, believing as their fathers believed, hoping for the fulfillment of the ancient prophecies, and praying as did they of old, for a Redeemer to lead them to the "Land that floweth milk and honey."

Wrong again. The modern Jews believe nothing of that. And yet, were you to ask any ordinary Jew what he believes, I doubt if the answer would come forth as glibly and trippingly as you would expect. He might tell you he believes in Judaism; but if you inquire: "What is Judaism?" the answer will be owing. As a matter of fact, there are few people, including Rabbis, who could give a ready answer to this question. But this is quite a different story. I would say, parenthetically, that the Jews are not the exclusively afflicted in that respect. Few professed Christians could readily answer the question, What is Christianity? These are puzzling questions; often asked and seldom answered. For does it not seem that "right doing" does not depend on the profession of churchism? The infidel, too, has a faith, which he expounds with much particularity and a raking in of coin, that would delight the shrivelled soul of a Shylock. What need is there of a Church, a Bible or a Sacrament, when you can be as good a citizen, husband, father and friend without? There is force in that; nay, more; there is even a good quality of logic in it. For after all, Moses, Christ, Mohammed and Buddah have concentrated their essential doctrines upon these very points. This is very nice, only the infidel has left out of consideration one serious point, "The Human Heart. The human heart, with its strange forces and feelings, its reverence and clinging regard for those things which were sown in tears, harvested in sorrow, and eaten in drear moments of utter desolation.

It is strange that we have such fancies; that we do not cast our dead into the sea, or leave them a prey to vultures and jackals. It is strange that we hurry those we love in the safest recesses of our seared hearts and yearning souls, to be called forth with memories, sweet, tender and holy. It is strange, also, that we keep mementos of those whose lives were intertwined with ours, and guard them as precious. Is it not enough to think now and then of those that have passed away and then live for the living? No, it is not! And as long as this is so, the human family will need some tangible form to guide it safely, to link its present with the past; to make it look straight ahead in time of danger, but be retrospective in moments of peace and quiet joy. And for this retrospectiveness, for the linking of the present with the past, some strong chain is necessary; this chain with the Jews is the Bible. He—the average Jew—loves it, not so much for what it contains as for the associations it recalls. A few years ago the Jews of Italy offered the Pope $300,000 in gold for an old manuscript Bible, simply because its birth happened at a time when Israel's wound was yet fresh.

The learned Jew loves the Bible for another, one might say, nobler reason; for, the most beautiful in literary form—that which by its power, cadence and rhythm, inspires the soul regardless of its historical dubiety, must of necessity rank much higher than any other expression; higher in fact, than the very laws that gave it being, since it can rise superior to them in its capacity in revealing the weal and woe of a human soul. Who asks, who cares for the origin of the beautiful? It is there; that is enough. The learned Jew thus luxuriates in the beauties of the Bible. There is something infinitely touching in the love he hears the lore of his people. How he dwells upon every expression, every shade of meaning underlying each word; how he turns and rolls it upon his tongue like a sweet morsel. To him every word is pregnant with power and possibilities. Take, for example, the word Jehovah. He knows that Yah (as in the Phœnician language) means "Being and Becoming," the "Sein und Werden" of the German philosophers, the "Is" of the world. To the learned Jew the word Jehovah or Ya-ha-veh, has a treble significance: Ya, God is; Hoveh, God was, and Jeveh—(by grammatical adjustment) means God will he! Thus he goes through the mazes of this cosmic volume and luxuriates in an Eden to which the uninitiated have no admittance. For, to properly appreciate the Bible, one must read it in the hebrew language. To grow conscious of its beauties, grasp the great truths it contains, you must be a Jew, a learned Jew, or know the tongue in which David sang, Jeremiah wept, and Isaiah measured his strength with the angels in heaven. The Jew reads the Bible in Hebrew; he feels the weight and volume of every measure; he becomes an actor in the dramas written and acted by his poets and seers. This is as it should be. One who reads and understands the original language of any literary work does not care to read it in translation, however excellent such may be. The best rendition of Homer's works in a foreign tongue does not interest the scholar who can read the resonant and swinging lines of Hellas' immortal hard.

THE men say the army chaps are getting all the innings now in society. But whose fault is it, anyway? Soldiers are proverbially brave, and if a second Lieutenant is willing to face matrimonial life on his pay, surely a clerk in grain, insurance, or bank offices has an equal chance to go in and win the girl of his choice. But if selfish considerations and fear of curtailment of personal enjoyment weighs with the civilian, why, then, no wonder that none but the brave deserve the fair.

* * *

Surely, '96-7 will be known as the season of weddings. Engagement "announcements" are made daily, and one by one our loveliest belles are carried off from the ranks of girlhood and make our list of charming young matrons (already a long one) still more enlarged. The latest brides-lect who have each chosen military chaps—Miss Burton and Miss Ethel Cohen—have always been among the most popular of our social belles. Apropos of Miss Cohen, a girl friend remarked at the engagement tea, "I'm sure it's been a plain fact to any one who had eyes that Ethel's thoughts were all in one direction bent for weeks past," and a man near by, wishing to go one better, added: "Ya-as; and when the dear girl said Ly-man, of course he fell down. Who wouldn't, ye know?"

* * *

If anything could serve to accentuate the taint of Anglophobia which is current in our "best society," it would be the fact that several of the swagger set arranged an outing at a fashionable country settlement "to get away from the nuisance and fuss of Washington's birthday, don't ye know." Where, oh where, is the spirit of '76 that our forefathers held for? Why don't the colonial dames, instead of reading papers on a lot of stuff, get their men folk imbued with a feeling of patriotism and pride in the America of to-day, as well as of the past?

As Lent approaches, the fun increases; that is, teas and cotillions multiply, but card clubs are already being organized to play during the Lenten period. To an outsider, it has a comical side, when one sees a woman rushing daily to church for morning service, and in the afternoon or evening, as the case may be, playing whist, euchre, or poker, for that the latter game is patronized by the women is attested by the coterie who assemble under the wing of a prominent society matron, who is a member of the Romish church.

Apropos of this Lenten diversion, it is related that a lady who was rebuked by her minister for playing cards in Lent, offered to temporize by saying that a club of ladies had agreed to give the jack-pot winnings to his church, when to her amazement the clergyman replied: "My dear Mrs. —, I would not touch a cent of such money, nor would I allow it to be used for church purposes. Don't for a moment think absolution can be bought thus."

The rainy weather of the past fortnight has not alarmed the guests of the Hotel Rafael. On the contrary, numbers of fashionable people have flocked there to avoid the dullness of a storm-swept city, and congregate around the fireside of the long parlor, play cards, sing or chat, as inclined. The list of arrivals daily goes on increasing, and the indications are that this favorite place will be the Mecca for fashionables during the coming season.

News comes from New York that our California girls, the Misses Ethel Keeney and Leontine Blakeman, are enjoying hugely the many attractions of that fascinating metropolis.

The last dance of the Friday Fortnightlies evidenced that Eastertide will in all probability usher in another society engagement.

Young Pierson, son of General Fred Pierson, will shortly visit the Pacific Coast. He is a clever young business man, popular as a clubman and a sportsman, and one of the heirs to a large fortune. I trust the California débutantes will not let such a prize escape them.

* * *

Now, that our contemporary's army writer has shown up the methods employed by the officers' wives to secure husbands for maiden sisters, the girls will be chary of going on visits to their sisters at army posts, lest they be accused of following it up.

* * *

Rumor is again rife with coupling another young Boardman and a society blonde. The military brother-in-law is also spoken of as a possible successful suitor. Which shall it be? says the swim.

It is predicted that Miss Leila Burton will make a hit in aste on Monday night, and 'tis said that manager Bouvier is enthusiastically hoping for a bright star to arise in his firmament theatrical.

Mrs. Ernest C. La Montague has taken a cottage at Cedarhurst for next summer overlooking the new golf links of the Rockaway Hunt Club.

The Western Avenues, or Toil and Travel in Further North America. By Morley Roberts. New Edition, illustrated by A. D. McCornick, and from photographs. Westminster. Archibald Colclahle and Co. 1896.

A Book of the Week. This book was originally published in 1887, —not in 1896, as The Bookman erroneously supposes—but its author, having since that date made a reputation as a writer of stories, has lately re-issued it in an improved form. It is a record of varied experiences in the United States and Canada, such as many Britisbers have gone through, but few have related. It is, as its author says, commonly spoken of as a book of travel, but is really an autobiography, inasmuch as it contains an account not merely of the literal journeyings, but also of the spiritual experience of the writer. Mr. Roberts, after wandering in Australia, and serving for some time on board ship as a sailor, found himself in London in broken health. Having a brother in Texas, he decided to go to that State, where he berded sheep, and lived a rough healthy life. From Texas he went to Chicago in charge of cattle on a train; thence into Iowa and Minnesota. Several times he was “dead broke,” and at his wits’ end to procure the barest necessities of life. Seeing a notice to the effect that laborers were wanted on the Canadian Pacific Railway, he paid out his last few dollars for 1600 miles’ transportation for himself and a friend through Canada to the Rocky Mountains. He and a large number of other men, of various nationalities, went to work in the Kicking Horse Pass. The life was rough and hard, but the food was plentiful, and his companions, if coarse, were sometimes jovial and good-humored, and, in rare instances, not altogether insensible to the charms of music and higher things. Thence across the Selkirks to the Golden Range and the Spushwap Lakes, and so on to British Columbia, where he worked on farms and in a saw-mill. Eventually, after much wandering and long tramping, he reached Crescent City, whence he paid his fare by steamer to San Francisco, landing here with just “two bits” in his pocket. Happening to alight in this city during a hard winter when it was estimated that there were twenty thousand men out of work, he often went without food for a whole day, and was constrained to catch a broken rest upon bare boards. To use the writer’s own words: “For three months San Francisco was a city of sorrow and despair to me, of laborious occupation or worse, of none at all, of poverty, of starvation, of discomfort—the uneasy sleep, and the dreams of better things, and the awakening to misery and starvation—it was bitter.” In the middle of the month of April Mr. Roberts received an offer of work on a “ranche” in Lake County, but, as it was necessary that he should engage himself for a year, refused it. After trying for a few weeks to make a living as a book agent, he came to the conclusion that Nature had not gifted him with the necessary “gall,” sold the sample atlas which he had wearily dragged about for some weeks, and once more was without employment. But a stroke of luck came in the shape of an engagement to work on a vineyard in Sonoma County at twenty dollars a month. He stayed there long enough to save sufficient money to carry him back to England, and, joyfully bidding farewell to his Italian fellow-workers, journeyed rapidly across the continent to the Atlantic, crossed it and stepped again upon his native soil. The book throughout is most interesting, and though we have read scarcely anything else written by Mr. Roberts, we are half-disposed to agree with the critics who have said that the writer will never do better work than this. In a certain sense the criticism is doubtless true, for it is a simple straightforward account of actual physical toils and mental sufferings, and conveys to the reader’s mind a sense of reality that can scarcely be produced by the feigned adventures of imaginary characters. So many Europeans, and Britishers in particular, have done so very much the same things in North America as Mr. Roberts that this graphic record cannot fail to interest a large number of readers.

The February issue of Harper’s Magazine contains Richard Harding Davis’s account of the coronation of the Czar of Russia, with six illustrations by R. Caton Woodville; Poultney Bigelow’s account of the President of the Orange Free State; stories by Sara Beaumont Kennedy, Octave Thanet, and Margaret Sutton Briscoe. The first of Mr. Charles F. Lummis’s articles on Mexico appears under the title of “The Awakening of a Nation.” Mr. Lummis is familiar with Mexico and the Spanish language, and has recently traversed the country from end to end, conversing with men of every grade from President to peon. He is strongly impressed with the great work that has been accomplished by Diaz, who, since 1876 has been undisputed master of Mexico, and during all that time has saved it from the revolutions that chronically afflict all other Spanish-American communities. He has freed his country from the curse of brigandage, provided it with railroads, telegraphs, electric lights, and an excellent system of public education. Under his firm control life, property, and civic rights have been made positively more secure in the United States of Mexico than in the United States of North America. The Federal and State governments have been cleared of the corrupt and incompetent men who formerly infested all the public offices, and, despite the President’s boundless opportunities for enriching himself in ways commonly considered entirely legitimate by Spanish-American public men, he has remained an only moderately wealthy man. Mr. Lummis’s article is illustrated with excellent pictures, which are apparently the result of combining the work of the sketcher with that of the photographer, somewhat after the manner in which Mr. Clifton Johnson’s pictures are made. In the literary notes are some complimentary remarks on Mr. E. F. Benson’s recently issued novel “Limitations.” Mr. Lawrence Hutton shows his appreciation of Mr. Benson’s intelligence and cleverness, which the criticsasters of the daily press have sometimes affected to doubt. But it is really surprising (or perhaps it isn’t after all) how much more appreciative of other men’s intelligence a clever man is than a dull one. A dull man, not content with being fat-witted himself, believes everybody else to be dense also. The Bæotians, no doubt, entirely failed to perceive the Athenians’ superiority to themselves.

It is really quite a task nowadays to keep oneself informed upon the chances and changes of periodical literature. In June 1895 we sent an article to a magazine entitled “The Monthly Illustrator,” the price of which was thirty cents: it was accepted conditionally by Mr. Harry C. Jones, who then owned the Magazine. Soon the Monthly Illustrator was purchased by Mr. J. W. Kay, who incorporated with it Home and Country, then selling at fifteen cents. The magazine was now known under the cumbersome title of the two periodicals of which it was made up, and was sold for twenty cents. During 1896 the price was reduced to five cents, and continued so for several months. The article accepted by a thirty-cent magazine in 1895 was ultimately published in January 1897 by a five-cent one. But we are pleased to record the fact that the compensation paid to the writer was that originally agreed upon by the proprietor of the thirty-cent periodical. Now in February the magazine has increased its size, raised its price to ten cents, and dropped the first part of its name, being simply known as “Home and Country.” We wish it success.

The Railway Magazine, published in New York by Mr. G. H. Baker, who was formerly Fuel expert for the Southern Pacific company, is a handsome periodical. It is devoted entirely to matters of interest to railroad men, and certainly should have considerable value to them. The January issue, which reached us somewhat late, contains an installment of Dr. Seward Webb’s account of his trip to the Pacific Coast and Alaska, and a long and fully illustrated article on the Mexican Central Railway, by Arthur Inkersley, besides other contributions by experts in railroad matters.

The March issue of the Traveler will contain an article on President Diaz of Mexico, with some estimate of the work he has accomplished in tranquillizing and modernizing that old and picturesque country. It will be illustrated with the excellent photographs for which The Traveler is noted.

DEAR EDITH: It will be a long time before Paris loses entirely its supremacy in the art of woman's dressing. At times, the great modistes of New York and London surpass their French rivals and originate styles which run around the world, and then, just when it seems as if the scepter were to pass from the French metropolis to an Anglo-Saxon one, there comes an outburst of beautiful styles and exquisite designs which cannot be surpassed, if even equaled. Of late, there has been such a series of surprises in the French dress world! Some of the new designs are monuments of artistic completeness. One dress, an evening gown, which has just arrived in this country, was a Princess robe in urauium green satin, half-veiled with black Chantilly lace. It had any number of ruches and half ruches at the neck. The skirt was very slightly gored to form a graceful apron front, of which one side seemed to be held by a magnificent bow in black satin, whose ends, falling within a quarter of a yard from the floor, were tipped with gold and black aiguillettes. The black ruching of the corsage changed into heavy black satin straps around the armholes and a mass of bows and ribbons upon the shoulders. Here and there along the bottom of the skirt, as if flowing from the ruching beneath, were black velvet roses with jeweled centers. There were two of these upon the shoulder.

Most ingenious of all was a provision whereby this superb toilet could be converted into a tea gown. This was effected by a necklet or collarette made of black satin ribbon, jetwork, gold gems, held in place by satin bows, and reinforced by two heavy black satin ribbons which started in the middle of the collar at its lower edge and thence ran like shoulder braces around under the arm and meeting in front. The necklet was just open enough to disclose the pink flesh of the back and chest, but sufficiently solid to make the general appearance that of a very richly decorated and magnificent house gown.

There is another à la style of dress which, it is said, has been ordered by one of the great stars of the Comedie Française. This evening gown is tightly fitting and suggests some of the styles of the last century. The skirt is gored and gathered so to hang comparatively smooth one-third of the way down, so that it meets a graceful hand of lisse frills, fur, and lace. It runs another third with a smooth surface, and is again limited by a similar decoration. From here it falls in narrow, irregular pleats to the ground, and at the bottom is edged with fur. The bodice-waist is tight-fitting, the shoulder piece is a mere cuff, and the sleeves are almost as tight as if the arms had been wound with the material. Instead of being smooth, they are marked by the Bernhardt wrinkle. The upper part is cut décolleté, quite low upon the sides, so as to expose the throat and shoulders, and a goodly part of the chest and back, but instead of being finished with a straight line, a circular curve is employed, which rises high up in the middle of the chest and back.

A beautiful dinner gown of white satin. Narrow embroidery studded with seed pearls is used for trimming. Pointed corsage with Medici collar of guipure lace. Fichu-like drapery of finest thread lace, caught at shoulder by agraffe of pearls and diamonds. Sleeves of thread lace encircled by bands of pearl embroidery, and finished at elbow with dainty lace ruffle and agraffe of pearls and diamonds. Skirt tightly fitted over hips; all fullness gathered at back, where it falls in a train. Graduated bands of pearl embroidery placed diagonally up front of skirt. A single white rose with buds and leaves at bust, and another in hair.

Business on Pine Street. The little spurts which take place in the speculative market on Pine street on news of the slightest improvement in the mines, tend to show the possibilities which exist for creating an old time excitement. What is lacking is a leader, some one with brains and money to back them, who could restore and maintain the confidence of the investing public. The representatives of the several cliques in control of the mines have done well in holding the market together as it is, but the burden has been a heavy one. In talking of high salaries being paid to many officials, people overlook or are ignorant of the fact that the bulk of the money thus expended by the companies finds its way back into the market sooner or later in support of the stocks they represent. Nearly all of these men belong to the old school of speculators, ever ready to back an improvement in the mines under their control with the last dollar they have in their pockets. There is not a rich man on the list of these officials. They alone have stood behind the market for months past unassisted to any great extent by the wealthy inside operators who have held aloof for reasons well known to any one acquainted with the business. There is a chance now for an improvement in the market if the development on Con. Virginia opens out as it now promises to do. The Chollar-Brunswick ground is turning out even better than its friends predicted, but this seems to be lost sight of owing to existing jealousies which would be swept out of existence with the advent of a wealthy class of speculators. Neither the men in control nor the mine itself have had a fair deal, but this could hardly be expected as things are now on Pine street. The new work contemplated at the south end by the Crown Point, Jacket and Kentuck companies may open up a new and brighter future for these shares before long, should the ore come in again in Kentuck that the late Governor Stoneman found on the levels above, which made him rich.

The Garfield Dies Hard. The methods adopted by the London promoter to keep an old game alive are fairly exemplified in the case of the Hampton Plains Exploration Company. When Mr. Hooper left the Garfield mine of Nevada, it was on its last legs. It had done well under his management up to this point, and had the prospects held out, it is not likely he would have abandoned it. In merging it, the Lepanto and Pittsburg, with a Westralian mine, when that locality began to boom, the management accomplished two ends, in securing a ready-made list of shareholders for the new toy, letting themselves down easy on the Nevada propositions. The latest report of this clique of promoters is a gem in its way. The Garfield, Pittsburg, and Lepanto are still held, although it is admitted they are not workable with success, for the reason that "as long as we can retain these properties at a small cost, it is in the interest of the shareholders that we should not part with them." The trouble more likely is, that they are like a lot of old family heirlooms—only fit to hang in a garret, for nobody else wants them. Why not admit the mines are played out, and have done with it, so far as the Garfield and Lepanto are concerned, at any rate.

Ten Million Mining Deal. If rumor is not at fault, as it so often is, a transaction will soon be concluded in London that will put the Mariposa grant proposition in the shade, not to speak of the airy fabrications of the professional promoter of Moute Cristo schemes in California. The property about to change hands is located in the western section of this continent, and the company, when it appears, will be capitalized for $10,000,000, with every chance that the shares will not go a-hegging at this figure. It has been passed upon by experts, who have won name and fame for reliability, and the vendor himself is a power in the mining world. This sale, when closed, will turn the tide of foreign capital westward again, which has set for a time so strongly in the direction of South Africa and Westralia.

Draining the American Flat. The initiatory steps have been taken in the new enterprise looking toward the drainage of the American Flat, by the incorporation of a company in Nevada. At the head of the company are H. M. Yerrington, W. E. Sharon, E. D. Boyle, and other prominent mining men of the Silver State. The mines of this district have been prospected down to a depth of between 500 and 600 feet, when the influx of water was so heavy that the companies, handicapped by a sbortage of funds, were unable to handle it. There are probably forty mines in this district, the most important being the Rock Island, Baltimore and Knickerbocker, which proved very rich down to the water level. It has been found that drainage is possible to an additional depth of 600 feet all over the Flat below the water level, which will leave an immense area of ground open for development. The advantages of this enterprise in restoring activity to the market on Pine street, and life to Virginia City, must be patent to every one acquainted with the situation, both here and in Nevada. No difficulty should, therefore, be experienced in putting it into practical operation so far as the necessary money is concerned. The names of some prominent capitalists are already mentioned in connection with the project as possible subscribers for stock, and should they do so, their example will be followed by many others who only await some guarantee of the kind as to the merits of the investment.

A Californian in Australia. The many old friends of Mr. Henry C. Callahan, who left California some years ago under engagement with an Australian mining company, will be pleased to hear that the property under his management has proved a grand success. The Western Argus, of Kalgoorlie, in referring to it in a recent issue says: "The Lake View Consols is opening up so splendidly that from present appearances it promises to startle the world. It is only a few months since it was taken over by the English company, and already the property presents a wonderfully altered appearance. With Mr. H. C. Callahan as mining engineer in charge, and Mr. Banks as mine manager, the View has been opened up in a manner which will in the near future enable the thousands of tons of ore in sight to be easily and economically extracted." There is one thing that can be said of English companies, they are never backward in bestowing credit where it belongs, nor in pushing men to the front when they are found worthy of merit. There is no stinginess either in the matter of salaries.

Some Mexican Mine Flotations. The Consolidated Gold Fields of Mexico, Limited, is the name of a $1,500,000 incorporation launched in London, to pay $500,000 for some 17,000 acres of land in Sonora, Mexico, with a 60-stamp mill and mine known as the Santa Elena and its extension. George D. Roberts is accredited with having a hand in this deal. Some nice things are said about the mine by experts, including a Mr. Wuensch, which would lead the ordinary man to imagine it a bonanza. The other blossomed out in New York under the auspices of two gentlemen of fashion, now figuring in society circles in this town. It is known as the California-Mexico Gold Mining and Development Company, with a capital of $1,000,000. The prospectus alludes to the ownership of a fine gold property in California under process of development, but we fail to connect the names mentioned with any operation of the kind. They are more familiar in matters of life insurance.

The South is Recognized. On March 1st, A. S. Cooper, C. E., will take up the duties of State Mineralogist, having been appointed by the Governor. The gentleman comes highly recommended by his neighbors in Southern California, and his record certainly shows an experience in the field of many years. With new men around him as subordinates, there is an opportunity for good in the institution, which could be utilized to much better advantage than the past has to offer in the way of practical demonstration. It will be hoped that Mr. Cooper will rise above the political environment of the situation, while keeping himself free from the entanglements of outside enterprises, which do not tend to elevate the reputation of the Bureau either at home or abroad.

John Lauer

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

SITTING in solemn conclave within these unrighteous city limits one day this week, the representative gospel dispensers gravely discussed the subject of pulpit dress. One or two giddily inclined to knee breeches and be-furbeled waistcoats, but their vain desires were promptly frowned down by such exponents of virtue as the Reverends F. D. Bovard and Edwards Davis, who inveighed against such frivolities with all the pugilistic strength of jaw for which they are distinguished. The matter of fancy dress at the fount of grace should be dismissed summarily. The churches have enough expense to stagger under without incurring a wardrobe fund. Besides, not one preacher in a thousand has nether extremities that would warrant display in high-water pauts of ye colonial days, and pipe-stems are ever unbeautiful, whether exhibited in a pulpit or at a bal masque.

Nay, other potent reasons are there yet
To cause a congregation sore distress;
On salaries that these divines now get
They cannot garb themselves in fancy dress
And please the eyes of critics fair—unless
Their salaries are raised at least one-half.
The reason why? Why, surely you can guess.
He must live high who'd own a fatted calf.

FIFTY barrels of pork, beans, and molasses have been stowed away in the hold of the Percy Edwards, as part of the cargo to be conveyed to the South Sea Islands by the adventurers who sail thither in search of wives and bappiness on a colonized plan. Well, maybe the gastronomic tastes of the dusky maidens down there are as simple as their notions of dress, but the TOWN CRIER wouldn't give a figleaf for domestic bliss in those idyllic regions should Satan smuggle in a copy of that mild yet pernicious publication, Tropical Toilettes, or temptation is imported in the form of an icecream soda fountain, or somebody starts a French restaurant. Go, brethren, and God bless you, but keep civilization at bay, or your heaven will be a hades on your hands.

MERELY because a venturesome tailor, out for ozone the other day in Oakland, lost control of his wheel, and the machine ran away with him, the papers across the bay were thrown into paroxysms of excitement. Why, San Francisco is swarming with people, including an ex-Mayor and many others, who have not only lost control of every wheel in their heads, but slipped their trolleys, too. Some of these suburban towns never do know when they are well off.

PRETTY, little Mrs. Holmes has been kissed repeatedly at dawn by a borrid Chinaman, and has vigorously complained to the police. The lady's analysis of the Chinese kiss is naive. She says it has not the low, suctional gurgle of a Christian kiss, but, on the contrary, "a low, disagreeable chuckle like the cackle of a hen." May that heathen be smote hip and thigh if he would dare osculate like a hen on Mrs. Holmes' ruby lips.

SHE was sitting right before me, and she wore a lofty hat, I did not cast upon her a hot reproach for that; I did not whisper, "Female, if you're a lady, please off hat, and let your eccent support it on his knees." But I blest her for that mat of plumes which veiled me from a curse, For the play was dull and rotten, and the actors somewhat worse. Ye ralliers at the fashions, think there may come a time When the high hat is a blessing, and not a social crime.

THE Irish societies object to a prize fight taking place on St. Patrick's day. This will never do. The race has ever been distinguished for its gallantry in the field, its love of fighting, and great ability to spring a "rookawn" at the shortest notice. Why of all days in the calendar that of the good Saint is the most appropriate for a little bit of fun among the "gossoons."

"WOMEN who wear short hair," says a Chinese superstition, "will be transformed into men in the next world." Faith, nay! the Mongolian theory is only half way right. They are rapidly becoming men on this side of the River Styx.

IN a symposium of opinions expressed by several solid citizens as to how a lone, lorn widow, with kindergarten incumbrances, can live on a five-thousand-dollar inheritance, Horace T. Platt is quoted as advising her to marry again, Uncle George Bromley toys with the subject in the frivolous manner peculiar to old boys of eighty, and A. S. Baldwin ventures the suggestion that the mythical relict of John Doe raise chickens to eke out an existence. Fic, gentlemen, as if each one of you did not know that a five-thousand-dollar widow will not stay single long enough in these hard times for you or anybody else to give her advice!

THE gypsies have been ejected from Sausalito, and the fortunes of the English colony will no more be told by those brown descendants of the Pharoahs. No more shall the anxious wife, whose husband missed the last boat from town, be able to discover for a quarter of a dollar in the hand of the seeress, whether he was working at the office, or the electric bell at Marchands, writing figures, or squeezing figures, opening new accounts or small "bots." They did quite a profitable business in this line, for the Sausalito matrons are stern and exacting, and the Sausalito men enjoy the perils, and wickedness of a great city.

THE Board of Health has decreed that the surgeons at the Receiving Hospital shall wear the undress uniform of naval officers. Now, what the conection can be between a naval officer and a surgeon, only that sapient body may understand. The regalia of a Knight of the Gold Plated Hod would be less expensive and more showy, but if the Board wishes its surgeons to have a nautical leaning in their garments, why not attire them in the full dress uniform of a royal horse marine?

PRESIDENT Horace Platt, in regard to the Mardi Gras ball, remarks: "All ladies who are admitted to the floor must wear masks. It is not essential that they should wear costumes, though it is very desirable that they should do so." Desirable, indeed! Well, we should thank so. It would be simply awful to see a room full of ladies with nothing on but masks. Why, the modest Mr. Platt himself would never survive the spectacle.

DOES Corbett's wardrobe, pray, include
Pajamas, or a robe de nuit?
Why such an item should elude
The lynx-eyed press, I fail to see.
I'm told concerning socks and trousers,
Such details as the law allows, sirs,
Then pray inform me quickly how, sirs,
You've nerve to ask subscription fee
And thus withhold the news from me?

"MANGLED in the dance" was the startling way in which a local daily referred to the manner of enjoyment adopted by guests at a notable society function this week. It was, of course a typographical error, that substituted "mangled" for "mingled," but any one who has endeavored to trip the light fantastic at a fashionable crush will certify that the linotype knew what it was about.

RICHARD ASHE, or Butler, has been singing sweetly for his sympathetic lady visitors, and has a pretty knack of turning verses not his own. A murderer's concert would not be a bad idea. Durrant is musical, Ashe has talent, and beyond doubt there are enough in the City Jail to make up the chorus. The funds might be used to buy a diamond sbirt-pin for Judge Campbell.

ANOTHER move has been made in the Cooney case. Now, if some of the cases in which a few of our pet murderers are concerned would only get a move on—it matters not in what direction, so long as a scaffold is the objective point—sad-eyed Justice could then come forth from ber San Francisco corner and look Honesty in the face.

IF we could have one week of quiet,
Without a murder or a riot,
We'd think that the millenium,
Of which we've heard so much, had come.
But oh, these crimes! 'Tis hard to shake 'em
While Willie's minions live to fake 'em.

THE Senate and Assembly have been considering the new game bill this week, but no amount of new game bills cau divert the attention of the gentlemen at Sacramento from the old ones. The kind of game they are out for is always safely bagged, too. In fact, it is carried in a sack.

THERE is no gossip—really except that Calvé has a crank admirer who threatens to slay her, and who has so terrified her that she dares not go to the opera house without a strong and imposing body guard. The gentleman demands an interview or suggests death, which is surely trying. Detectives have so far failed to capture him, and the prima donna's life is apparently unsafe. With the prospect of Melba's return, things are beginning to look a bit brighter for the opera company. That beautiful voiced, unemotional piece of vocal statuary, Madame Eames, is recovering from her recent illness, and will be able to sing by the end of next week. Without Calvé it is hard to know what would have become of the opera during the last weeks.

St. Valentine's eve was celebrated as this day usually is by the kettledrum of the Samaritan Home. Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs assisted in making it a success, and her sister was one of the prettiest girls in the room.

Mrs. George Harding has been in town for a few days on a visit from her Philadelphia home. Philadelphia seems to be the successful home of Californians. Mrs. Harding (Lillie Jones), Mrs. Spreckels (Miss Dore), Mrs. Robinson (Aileen Ivers) are among the San Franciscans who have made their homes in the Quaker City. Mrs. Elkins (Kate Felton) is another, by the way, and they are all quite in the swim in exclusive Philadelphia.

"Dick" Tobin is still here at the Waldorf, where he has been mistaken for an Englishman, and I can imagine no greater joy for the man whose father was a loyal Irishman and the host of Michael Davitt.

James Brett Stokes is the most stunning thing on the Avenue. He is very devoted to General Whittier's younger daughter. The elder married a Russian Prince two years ago.

Mrs. Gillig will sail early in March for the other side, probably taking the Genoa route in one of the Hamburg-American boats, and will be absent for two or three months.

The cable to-day announces at last the decree of divorce in the Thornburgh-Cropper affair, which has hung fire for so long. It has all through, it is said, been more or less a burlesque. I recall a story that was told when Captain Cropper went out to the Zulu war, and when his mamma-in-law and "darling Minnie" were supposed to be breathing freer. He came back laden with medals for heroism. I suppose many Californians remember his bravery in leaping overboard in the Golden Gate Straits to rescue a drowning sailor, because of which act he was again decorated. He is one of the most popular men in London, because of his bravery, his cleverness and his truly charming character.

THE UNHAPPY THREE.

THERE were three of them—the girl, the chaperon, and the fiancé; the count, merely an appendage for stage effect, not being considered.

And they were all happy, for it was a very swell affair. "You'll excuse me, I hope," said the girl, as she took the arm of the count. "I'm engaged for this—and this—and these," showing a well-filled card.

"Certainly," assured the fiancé, with a tender pressure of the hand, "but for the time being only. The count must return you soon."

He bowed as he spoke, and the girl smiled over her shoulder as they whirled away.

"It is good of you to be so generous," said the chaperon, as the fiancé dutifully brought her an ice.

"Very," he answered, smiling down into her eyes.

"Now, if I were you"—demurely, and speaking as a chaperon should—"I would insist on my rights, and not let the charming girl out of my sight."

A moment's attention to the frozen sweet. "He might be making love to her, you know," suggestively. "It would be dreadful, but I have heard of such things."

She looked at him innocently.

"It might be so," in alarm. "Suppose we go search for them. In the conservatory, perhaps? They might be there."

"Possibly!" The chaperon arose hastily. "I want to do my duty. Yes, I really think we ought to go."

"These chaperons are very convenient," laughed the count, as he led her into the fragrant conservatory. "We haven't seen her in an hour, and I'm sure we've looked everywhere. It isn't our fault, now is it?"

"Certainly not," said the girl, as she sank back into a seat. "But poor Charlie, I hope he won't be too hard on you when he does find us." She smiled archly.

"Why, there they —," began the count, but his voice died in a whisper.

"Of course you understand it is because I can't find her," the fiancé was saying, as he leaned over the chaperon and kissed her.

"Of course!" she murmured, and blushed—and her eyes fell on the girl.

Then she conveniently fainted. The girl rode home in the carriage alone.

The fiancé—fiancé no longer—swore inwardly as he watched her roll away.

The count was all smiles. There were three of them.

Unhappy three!—Life.

TRUE CRITICISM DEFINED.

TRUE criticism differs from defamation in the following particulars: First, criticism deals only with such things as invite public attention or call for public comment. It does not follow a public man into his private life or pry into his domestic concerns. Second, criticism never attacks the individual, but only his work. Such work may be either the policy of the Government, the action of a member of Parliament, a public entertainment, a book published, or a picture exhibited. In every case, the attack is on a man's acts, or on some thing, and not upon the man himself. A true critic never indulges in personalities, but confines himself to the merits of the subject matter. Third, true criticism never imputes or insinuates dishonorable motives unless justice absolutely requires it, and then only on the clearest proofs. Fourth, the critic never takes advantage of the occasion to gratify private malice or attain any other object beyond the fair discussion of matters of public interest and the judicious guidance of the public taste.

Nothing takes the edge off a rough experience of life, or adds a greater charm to its success than a convenient case of Argonaut whiskey. It is just the thing for all sorts of weather—pure, mellow, and invigorating. E. Martin & Co., at 411 Market street, are sole Pacific Coast Agents.

To buy your gentlemen's furnishing goods at John W. Carmany's, 25 Kearny street, is to be dressed in faultless fashion.

THE ROSE JAR

THE MESSENGER OF DEATH.—HERMAN MERIVALE, IN POEMS.

MISCALL me not! men have miscalled me much,
 Have given hard names and harsher thoughts to me,
 Reviled and evilly entreated me,
 Built me strange temples as an unknown god,
 Then called me idol, devil, unclean thing.
 And to rude insult bowed my godhead down.
 Miscall me not! for men have marred my form,
 And in the earthborn grossness of their thoughts
 Have coldly modeled me in their own clay,
 Then fear to look on that themselves have made.
 Miscall me not! ye know not what I am,
 But ye shall see me face to face, and know.
 I take all sorrows from the sorrowful,
 And teach the joyful what it is to joy;
 I gather in my landlocked harbor's clasp
 The shattered vessels of a vexed world,
 And even the tiniest ripple upon life
 Is, to that calm sunhime, as tropic storm.
 When other leechcraft fails the breating brain,
 I, only, own the anodyne to still
 Its eddies into visionless repose.
 The face distorted with life's latest pang,
 I smooth, in passing, with an angel's wing,
 And from beneath the quiet eyelids steal
 The hidden story of the eyes, to give
 A new and nobler beauty to the vest.
 Belie me not! the plagues that walk the earth,
 The wasting pain, the sudden agony,
 Famine and war and pestience, and all
 The terrors that have darkened round my name,
 These are the works of life, they are not mine;
 Vex when I tarry, vanish when I come,
 Instantly melting into perfect peace,
 As at His word, whose master spirit I am,
 The troubled waters slept on Galilee.
 Tender I am, not cruel; when I take
 The shade most hard to human eyes, and pluck
 The little shesby blossom yet unblown,
 'Tis but to graft it on a kindlier stem,
 And leaping o'er the perilous years of growth,
 Unwept of sorrow, and unscathed of wrong,
 Clothe it at once with rich maturity.
 'Tis I that gave a soul to memory;
 For round the follies of the had I throw
 The mantle of a kind forgetfulness;
 But canonized in dear love's calendar,
 I sanctify the good for evermore.
 Miscall me not! my generous fullness lends
 Home to the homeless, to the friendless, friends;
 To the starved babe the mother's tender breast,
 Wealth to the poor, and to the restless—rest!

FORGET.—RICHARD HODGSON, IN SCRIBNER'S.

Crowning a grave with hut one word—FOAGET,
 Gray in the shade the granite boulder lies.
 Child's, man's, or woman's? Whose the saddest eyes
 That gazed this thought upon the granite set?
 Speak the dead here? Or did the living fret
 In wastes of gloomy memory's wailing cries,
 Cursing this little life that lives and dies
 Because its fulness was not golden yet?
 Forget the living or forget the dead?
 Forget the turmoil or the tenderness?
 Forget the bitterest sorrow never said?
 Forget the last ineffable caress?
 Dear Soul! what matter now those faded embers!
 How dost thou smile to know that God remembers.

FORGIVE.—THE ACADEMY.

Wsit not to-morrow, hut forgive me now;
 Who knows what fate to-morrow's dawn may bring?
 Let us not part with shadow on thy brow,
 With my heart hungering,
 Wait not the morrow, hut entwine thy hand
 In mine, with sweet forgiveness full and free,
 Of all life's joys I only understand
 This joy of loving thee.
 Perhaps some day I may redeem the wrong,
 Repair the fault—I know not when or how,
 O, dearest, do not wait—it may be long—
 Only forgive me now.

INSURANCE.

THE German Alliance Insurance Association of New York was admitted this week to do business in this State. The company will be represented by George H. Tyson, who has been given the general agency for the Pacific Coast States and territories, and the Sandwich Islands. This company is an offshoot of the German-American Insurance Company, and its policies will be guaranteed by that company.

The newly-elected officers of the Underwriters' Association of the Pacific are: President, Russell Ogden, Superintendent agents of the Pennsylvania Fire; Vice President, Louis Weinmann, Assistant Secretary of the Fireman's Fund; Secretary, Calvert Meade, independent adjuster; Executive Committee, Edward Niles, R. P. Fabj and F. G. Argall.

March 12th has been selected as the date of the next dinner to be given by the San Francisco Life Underwriters' Association. These dinners are very popular, and greatly tend to develop the social side of the insurance world in the city. There is some talk of the perpetration of a daring innovation at the next dinner, but it is such a departure from the orthodox insurance banquet, that it is just a murmur as yet. Insurance men are proverbially gallant, and it has been whispered that it might not be a bad idea to give a double grace to the dinner in March by having ladies present.

John T. Fogarty has been made superintendent of agencies of the Pacific Department of the Royal and Queen Insurance Companies, by Manager Rolla V. Watt.

The solicitors for the different companies here claim that rebating is being carried on notwithstanding the efforts that are being made to suppress it. By the way, speaking of rebating, it is pertinent to ask Thomas B. Reed, Congressman from Maine and Speaker of the House of Representatives, if he thinks it just the proper thing for him to accept a salary of $5,000 per year as Referee, when he himself has declared that he did nothing to earn that fat fee? To say nothing of the possibility of being called upon to rule on matters of importance to insurance companies that might come before the House while he is in their pay?

Cadman & Haigh have been made State agents of the Standard Life and Accident Insurance Company of Detroit, succeeding Cadman & Kittle, the latter gentleman withdrawing to enter the general brokerage business.

R. C. Medcraft, the recently-appointed manager of the Pacific Coast department of the Scottish Union and National, has moved into offices at 319 California street.

The newly-elected officers of the Firemans Fund are: D. J. Staples, President; Wm. J. Dutton, Vice President; Bernard Faymonville, Secretary; Louis Weinmann, Assistant Secretary; J. B. Levison, Marine Secretary; Stephen D. Ives, General Agent.

All local agents in Berkeley, Alameda and Brooklyn, with the exception of R. H. Magill & Son, have entered the Alameda Board of Fire Underwriters, just organized for the purpose of sustaining rates.

The local agents at Fresno have organized for the purpose of restoring rates to the scale in operation under the old P. I. U. If they succeed, San Francisco should sit at their feet and learn a thing or two.

James U. Taintor, Secretary of the Orient Insurance Company, is in town. The Orient's policy has always been rather opposed to combining agencies, and as the Sun Office has recently passed into the hands of Manager Callingham, (now the Coast agent for the Orient), it is not improbable that the presence of Mr. Taintor may be attributed to this fact.

George N. North, who has just succeeded G. C. Pratt as California Manager of the Provident Life, took over the office last Thursday, E. O. Parker, Superintendent of agents for the company, directing the transfer.

IT is a source of no little pride to Colonel John P. Irish, Naval Officer at this port, that he is the only Federal officer who participated actively in the late presidential campaign without reproof. A month or two before the election Irish applied for leave of absence in accordance with the requirements of the service, and in due course obtained permission to take the desired furlough. Then he wrote to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury saying that he proposed, during his vacation, taking the stump against Mr. Bryan. He added that he would leave on the following morning on a trip through several Eastern States, and concluded with the request that if the department had any objection to his political tour he should be so advised. Colonel Irish then blithely departed on his scalping excursion. A month or two after the election was over, he visited Washington and, of course, paid his respects to the officers of his department. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury icily called his attention to the number of officials who had been dismissed for offensive partizanship during the campaign, and asked the Colonel what explanation he had to offer to avoid similar discipline.

"But," said Irish, with simulated surprise, "I told you I was going on a stumping trip and I gave you a chance to object."

"Now, look here, Irish," replied the Assistant Secretary, wrathfully, "How in the devil could we get word to San Francisco in time, when you mailed your letter to the department only the night before your departure?"

"My dear sir," answered the Colonel, in his blandest tones, "I am attached only to the Treasury Department, and I must decline to be held responsible for any defects in the postal service of the Government."

The Assistant Secretary gasped, speechless at the audacity of his subordinate. But the question of disciplining Irish was dropped then and there.

Shrewd young merchant though he is, Sim Erlanger occasionally overreaches his capacity, as he frankly acknowledges. His suburban home is equipped with many comforts, but it has always caused him regret that his bath tub was of tin instead of porcelain. Hearing that it could be painted to resemble the more expensive material, Sim consulted a painter who offered to do the job artistically for eleven dollars. As this price seemed exorbitant, Erlanger concluded to do a little painting himself and went home much pleased that he had procured a small can of "porcelain paint" for twenty cents. His joy was short lived, however, for the paint covered only about one square foot of the tin surface. After he had expended about three dollars for paint, Sim was dismayed to find that all his paint had run down to the bottom of the tub. He consulted an expert and learned that he should first have applied a coat of common paint to the tin, following that with the porcelain mixture, and that to remove the clotted paint from the bottom of the tub, he must soak it in turpentine. With considerable abatement of his artistic enthusiasm, Erlanger poured two gallons of turpentine into the tub. Upon his return from the theatre that night, he found his little dog, who had been having an unauthorized bath, spattering turpentine and white paint on the handsome Turkish rug in his drawing room. At the urgent request of his family Sim will henceforth devote all his talents to huying and selling wheat.

Although an enthusiastic advocate of boxing, an exponent of the manly art and a defender of prize fights, William Greer Harrison was hardly prepared to sanction pugilism when practised down on California street. He noticed one day that his office hoy was wearing rather a damaged countenance, one eye being almost closed and several contusions being visible on either cheek. When Harrison enquired the cause, the boy demurely explained that he had taken a header while coming on his bicycle down the Market street cable slot. The explanation was accepted without question, and the insurance manager, author, playwright, poet and lecturer thought no more about his injured clerk until the following morning when, entering his office an hour earlier than usual, he found desks and stools arranged in a semi-circle within which his boy and a lad in the uniform of a district messenger were pummeling away at each other, surrounded by a dozen of their admiring friends. It was the continuation of a battle commenced on the previous morning. Harrison was so interested in the result,—his hoy was getting the worst of it,—that he quite forgot the necessity for censure.

"There you are, Charlie," he shouted. "Now, there's an opening! Oh, you've made a mull of it."

The victorious messenger said it was because he had the insurance clerk just about finished that the latter's employer interfered and ordered a cessation of hostilities. However that may have been, it is now the subject of comment in insurance circles that Greer Harrison's latest protégé is receiving daily boxing lessons at the St. George's Club.

"Brick" Morse, leader of cotillions, athlete, football coach, banjo and guitar soloist, vocalist and humorist, is another Admirable Crichton in a small way, and it is said in the University Club that he can say more funny things in fifteen minutes than any other member,—but he runs to seed at the expiration of the time limit. Although after a prolonged struggle, he graduated two years ago, he still accompanies the University of California Glee Club on its semi-annual concert tours. At these entertainments "Brick" always does a character sketch in broken Dutch, which is counted on to arouse the risibilities of the audience. When he was at Marysville with the Glee Club recently he told his usual Dutch story, but instead of being interrupted with the expected shouts of laughter, his sallies were received in sadness and silence. "Brick" was much chagrined, and his mortification was so apparent that one of the other college musicians laughed unfeelingly, the first evidence of amusement in the audience. That laugh caused an audible murmur of reproof.

"What a shame to laugh at him," indignantly commented a Marysville girl. "Poor fellow, he is doing the best he can!"

Since that experience "Brick" has dropped character sketches from his repertoire. He feared that his impersonations were becoming too realistic.

The members of the San Francisco Colony at Carson comprising newspapermen, artists, and sports of all kinds and degrees are having a hard time of it with three feet of snow on the ground, the thermometer fifteen below and the accommodations even lower in the scale of comfort, but with prices of exceedingly ambitious tendencies. When the advance guard of fight visitors first made their appearance in Carson, rubber overshoes had a slack sale at fifty cents a pair. Owing to the snow, rubbers became a necessity to the Californians and they soon advanced in price to seventy-five cents, then to a dollar and finally reached a dollar and a-quarter for two rubbers, not mates, at that, all the stock in town being "lefts." After being pillaged by shopkeepers and hotelmen, the correspondents at the capital of the Battleborn State all donned sweaters, no other garment being sufficiently elastic to stand the strain of their disgust.

Joe Tobin is a stalwart athlete and is not unmindful of his successes on the field, but he has concluded that there are limits even to the glories of the gladiator. Entering the Baldwin Theatre at a first night performance, arrayed in irreproachable evening dress, he found that his seats were directly in front of one of those citizens who pride themselves on knowing everyone who is prominent and who audibly proclaim their knowledge.

"Why, there is Fitzsimmons," said the high pitched voice, as Joe pushed his top hat into the wire frame beneath his seat. "I did not know Boh was in town. Must have come down from Carson to see this show."

Everyone turned and stared admiringly at Tobin, who flushed and fidgeted, and when he could not stand the glare of popularity any longer announced to the members of his party that he "would have to go outside and change his face."

While in the management of the Anglo-California Bank, Philip N. Lilienthal never permits sentiment to interfere with business, in his private capacity he is widely known as possessing a kind heart and an exceedingly generous disposition. Always at the front in every philanthropic movement, his reputation for charitableness has become somewhat irksome to him. He was continually being importuned for financial aid, and his generosity has doubtless frequently been made the subject of imposition. After a day of many applications for assistance and private loans, which had made a good-sized hole in his purse, Mr. Lilienthal decided that he had reached the limit of indiscriminate donations, and concluded that no ordinary appeal to him would thereafter be effectual. As he was strolling along on recreation bent, he was stopped by a jaunty looking individual with a hard-luck story.

"I say, Phil," he began, for these geutry never lack an easy familiarity, "I haven't got a bean."

The banker's eyes snapped dangerously, but the applicant did not notice that he had touched the wrong key.

"You haven't a bean?" slowly repeated Lilienthal. "That's too bad. Er—allow me to supply the deficiency." And he whisked from his pocket a small white bean procured for just such an emergency, dropped it into the expectant hand of the man who was broke, and disappeared around a corner before the fellow had recovered from his astonishment.

The greatest event in the social life of the State University is the annual University Cotillion. This year's ball, which was held on Tuesday evening of this week, was attended by society personages from all the bay cities and was an unusually smart affair. The members of the Greek Letter Fraternities who managed the cotillion spared neither trouble nor expense in the perfection of their arrangements and the piece de resistance of the evening's entertainment was an elaborately concocted champagne punch served as soon as dancing began. So persistent were the attacks on this delicious beverage that by eleven o'clock the punch bowls, although they had many times been replenished, were finally drained dry. The thirsty dancers begged for more, and the committee, in dire dilemma, voiced the general protest to the caterer.

"Mon Dieu!" exclaimed that functionary, with uplifted hands. "You gentlemen ask for more of ze punch! Why you haz been drinking eet at ze rate of fifty gallons in ze hour."

Laurie Buntin, the tall old Scotchman whose inches make him almost a giant, but who is nevertheless known within the Bohemian Club as "Baby Bunting," is the author of a bon mot much quoted within club circles. A canvasser for the Examiner urged Mr. Buntin to subscribe for the Monarch of the Fakers, but found his intended victim obdurate.

"Do you take any daily paper?" asked the solicitor.

"Oh, yes, I get the Glasgow Herald," replied the gentleman from the land o' cakes.

"But that is fourteen days old when you receive it. Now, the Examiner will give you the news right up to date."

"Ah, yes. That may be," said Mr. Buntin, sententiously. "But, you see," he added with marked emphasis, "The Glasgow paper is reliable."

The precise mission of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor has never been accurately defined in ecclesiastical circles. Over in Alameda County it has dabbled in politics, and in many churches it has overridden old-fashioned usages. It remained for the branch of the society in connection with Plymouth Congregational Church of this city to achieve that social element of Christianity about which so much is now heard. At a recent meeting of the Christian Endeavor Society in that church, the devotions were temporarily interrupted while a paper was handed to the young lady presiding. The document was signed by a boy and a girl, both in their teens. It contained these words:

"We beg to announce our engagement, which occurred on the evening of St. Valentine's Day."

AT THE RACES.

INGLESIDE opened on Washington's Birthday with a very attractive programme, which was thoroughly enjoyed by the throng of people who filled every available inch of the grand stand. The racing was of the clean order, and the finishes exciting. The event of the day was the White Seal Stakes for two-year-olds, which were captured by the Burns and Waterhouse entry, Nupamax. Mr. Dunne's stable captured the handicap, and Reddington captured the hurdle race.

There are four stake events down for a decision at Ingleside, including the four-mile and a couple of two-year-old events.

Ladies' day (Wednesday) was another gala occasion at Ingleside, the event being the mile handicap, which was won by Mr. Hobart's crack, Ferric. W. O. B. Maedonough's Santa Bella bested Mr. Dunne's Preston in the six furlong spin, and Three Forks captured the hurdle race.

THE exhibit of advertising sketches held by Wilder & Co. in the Easterbrook building, 20-24 Geary street, Friday and Saturday of last week, was very successful, and elicited warm commendations from the several thousands of people who viewed it. The whole exhibit showed much originality, and was a happy blending of artistic attainment and advertising effectiveness.

SOCIETY

ON Tuesday evening there was a Lady Washington tea at Mrs. W. E. Fishers in aid of charity, and among other pretty features the minuet was danced by eight young ladies garbed in Colonial attire; and at several of the churches there have been Martha Washington teas, dinners and luncheons—other events of the week include the dance of the Winter Cotillion Club at Beethoven Hall on Tuesday evening; Mrs. Alexander Warner's luncheon yesterday; the hall of the Friday Fortnightly Club last night and the exhibition of the Sketch Club, etc.

Weddings have not been quite so numerous this week as last, but a very pretty one took place at the new Lutheran Church, on Eddy street, on Tuesday evening, when Miss Minnie Schilling and Henry H. Paulsen were united in marriage by the Rev. J. M. Buehler. The church, which was crowded with guests, was very prettily dressed with palms, ferns and jonquils—in fact it might have been called a yellow and white wedding, from the color of the chief flower used in decoration, and the gowns of the bridesmaids, Miss Rose Bauman and Miss Emily Paulsen, which were of white mousseline de soie over yellow silk, and their bouquets were of yellow daffodils. The bride looked charmingly in a robe of moire, and long tulle veil. She wore orange hlossoms in her hair and carried a bouquet of lilies of the valley. Fred Paulsen was his brother's best man. After the church ceremony there was a dancing reception at the Schilling residence, on Steiner street, and a handsome supper was served at midnight.

The engagement of Miss Minnie Burton and Lieutenant Pierce, U. S. A., which was first alluded to in these columns several weeks ago, has at last been "officially" announced. So another military wedding is on the cards for the swim who delight to assist at all hutton affairs of every description. In fact, there are two army weddings to occur in our fashionable circles in the near future, as Miss Ethel Cohen gave a tea at Mrs. Henry Gihons', where she has been passing the winter, for the purpose of announcing her engagement to Lieutenant Bent, U. S. A., who in his turn gave a dinner at the Presidio the same evening, at which he made the fact known to a party of his stag friends. Another recently announced engagement is that of Miss Mayhelle Gerst and Sam Naphaly, whose marriage will be the first event on the programme for the week after next. It will be celebrated at the California Hotel on the evening of the 7th of March.

A very pretty marriage took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Kerr, at 1738 Golden Gate avenue, last Wednesday evening, at which time and place Miss Grace Kerr and Mr. Charles A. Hulme were united by President Martin Kellogg, of the State University. The bride was handsomely gowned in white organdie over white silk, the skirt trimmed in narrow lace edged frills, the waist being made entirely of narrow bands of organdie and Valenciennes insertion. Miss Sadie Cooper was bridesmaid, escorted by Geo. P. Taylor, groomsmen. Mr. Hulme is a well-known down-town commission merchant. The residence was beautifully decorated for the occasion.

The Prisoner of Zenda, in a hurblesque form, will make his bow at the Coucordia Club to-night, and from those who have been present at the rehearsals, the promise is given that it will be one of the most enjoyable entertainments possible. The male sex only will be performers, and those taking the part of the ladies in the cast are said to be duly impressed with the importance of the roles, and are letter perfect in the matter of managing the skirts which they are to don for "this occasion only." The pleasures of the evening will conclude with supper and dancing. Caste on Monday night, and the Marli Gras ball at the Art Institute, are the two events of next week to which society is looking forward with the most pleasurable anticipations.

At no time has the delightful superiority of Hotel Rafael been more in evidence than during the past week, and mine host Warfield has been busy taking care of the many arrivals from the city who find every want anticipated by the thoughtful General.

Reading clubs, dancing clubs, whist and euchre clubs, and the like, are so common that they are scarcely remarked when they are arranged, but it is not often that one hears of dinner clubs being formed, though it must be acknowledged by those who appreciate a good menu a more delightful kind of club could not possibly be got up. Oakland has come to the front in this line, as that pretty little city has in many others, in giving charming hints to society on this side of the bay, and in organizing a dinner club; such hostesses as are well "up" in the art of giving gastronomic feasts being of course a sine qua non. The recent one which has been formed in Oakland has been very fortunate in this respect. The initial dinner took place last week.

Luncheons at the University Club were in great favor last week. At one of them Miss Della Davidson was guest of honor, Mrs. Landers being her hostess and sixteen young ladies asked to meet her. The giver of another of these dainty feasts was Mrs. W. I. Kip, who thereat entertained a number of the young lady friends of her daughters, the Misses Mary and Clementina. Mrs. Schwerine, Mrs. Wilson and Mrs. Center were among the dinner hostesses of the week.

The new Devisadero Hall was the place selected for the début party of Miss Beatrix Lyons of Haight street, which was given last Thursday evening. The decorations were extremely pretty, violets being the chief flower used for the purpose, combined with roses and smilax. The toilettes of the ladies were remarkable for their elegance, the fair young débutante wearing pale pink satin, Mrs. Lyons appearing in black brocade satin combined with moire, and Mrs. N. Fritz, who assisted these ladies in receiving their guests, wore a gown of black satin trimmed with chiffon and jet. Dancing, which was of course the order of the evening, took place in the ballroom, and at midnight supper was served in the lodge room, after which dancing was resumed and kept up until well on towards morning.

Miss Sarah Dean's daffodil tea at the Bella Vista last Friday had as guests of honor the Misses Lakeman of Grass Valley, and a number of our loveliest maidens assisted the young hostess in her duties to her guests. Last Saturday's tea at the Gerstles, when the charming daughter of the house acted as hostess, was a very delightful one. Beautiful flowers, sweet musical strains, delicious refreshments, served by lovely maidens in pretty costumes, combined to make it one of the most enjoyable affairs of the season. The receiving party was augmented at dinner by a number of the sterner sex, at which time there was dancing.

The last ante-Leuten cotillion of the Saturday Night Club, which was danced at Lunt's Hall on Saturday evening, was very largely attended, as have been all the club dances this month. Howard Adams, who led with Miss Edna Boyd, introduced four figures, and after they had been gone through there was general dancing. April 23d is the date set for the final dance of the club this season, which will be given at Native Sons' Hall.

Miss Alice Boggs will soon be with us again, returning from the East, where she has passed the winter months. In anticipation of her coming, Mr. and Mrs. Boggs have taken the residence 1404 Sutter street, where Mrs. Boggs will receive on Friday instead of Monday, which was her "day" while at the Palace Hotel.

"A company of ladies and gentlemen" will present Tom Rohertson's Caste at the California on Monday night. The proceeds of the performance to be divided between the Children's Hospital and the Armitage Orphanage.

The Hellman dinner party on Washington's Birthday was one of the finest affairs of the season. Their magnificent mansion is so well adapted for functions of this kind that little was left for the artist to do in the way of decorating. Some sixty young folks sat down to dinner at the three large tables, each of which was presided over by a married couple. Supper partners were assigned to the gentlemen on their arrival; but at a given signal, viz.: a bugle call, the ladies at each table, headed by the chaperon, left their seats and marched to one of the other tables and seated themselves as they liked. This occurred three times during the dinner, thus giving each lady a chance to visit every table, and finally return to her own partner. The innovation proved extremely enjoyable. Souvenirs in the shape of a piece of bark from a cherry tree, with a hatchet and silk flag attached, were neatly ribboned to the menu, on which was painted the name of each guest. Music and dancing followed. Miss Clara Hellman, who assisted her mother as hostess, was charming. She is one of the season's débutantes and extremely popular.

It has seemed that of late almost every day there has been chronicled the passing away of some old resident whose name was at one time almost a household word with our older set. One of the most recent who has crossed the silent river is Mrs. E. M. Stevenson, widow of the late Colonel J. D. Stevenson, who was well known in the social world of San Francisco since its earliest days. Mrs. Stevenson was a lady of gracious and most cordial manner, and hospitable to a marked degree, her home in past years being the center of all that was gay and pleasant in social life.

A grand benefit concert by the Clara Schumann quartette will be given on next Tuesday evening, March 2nd, at Y. M. C. A. Hall, corner Masou and Ellis streets, under the auspices of the Plymouth Christian Endeavor Society, the proceeds to be donated to the convention funds. Tickets 50 cents, to be had at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s., Benjamin Curtaz, and of members of the society.

The banquet at the Calliopean Club on Sunday evening last, commemorating its thirteenth anniversary, was indeed a success. Well nigh the entire membership responded to the club's invitation. The table was set in a square and very artistically arranged, and the post-prandial efforts brought forward were truly astounding.

Mr. Donald deV. Graham wishes to inform his pupils and friends that he has been forced to lengthen his stay in Honolulu, owing to an accident to the Belgic, which will prevent her stopping at the Island on her return trip. Mr. Graham will return on the 11th prox., instead of the 26th inst., as heretofore announced.

The Mardi Gras entertainment and bal masque to be given by the San Francisco Art Association on next Tuesday night, at the Art Institute, promises to be unusually delightful. Most elaborate preparations are making for this occasion, and the numerous guests of the association are anticipating an evening of unalloyed pleasure.

Mrs. L. S. Bachman and Miss Alice Bachman gave a delightful dinner party on Thursday evening, the 25th inst., at their home on Jackson and Devisadero streets. Miss Bachman, who is one of the season's débutantes, made a most admirable hostess.

Miss Irma Rothchild entertained quite a number of her friends at dinner on Tuesday evening. The guests of the evening were Mr. Joshua Eppinger and Miss Hilda Levy, in whose honor the fête was given.

Miss Wangenheim entertained her friends at an informal dinner on Wednesday evening. Miss Neustadter's rendition of several choice "morceaux" added greatly to the evening's entertainment.

Mr. and Mrs. Colin M. Boyd are spending a few days at Invercable, the country residence of Captain and Mrs. Duncan Mackinlay, Santa Clara County.

Stanford Parlor, Native Sons of the Golden West, successfully gave its eleventh anniversary party at Native Sons' Hall on Friday evening.

This evening the Concordia Club gives its grand ball and entertainment. The demand for invitations is unprecedented.

The attractions offered by the managers of the State Woman's Hospital for the tea which will be given at the Crocker mansion on California street to-day, are quite varied. In addition to the many beauties of the house itself, there will be vocal and instrumental music, refreshments, etc., and it promises to be one of the successes of the season.

Mrs. Luke Robinson gave a delightful luncheon last week in honor of Mrs. E. K. Moore, wife of Lieutenant-Commander Moore, of the Patterson. Covers were laid for sixteen, and the table exquisitely decorated in violets and daffodils.

There is every promise of a big season for the French grand opera company which comes to the Baldwin on Wednesday, March 10th. The subscription sale of seats commences next Wednesday.

ART JOTTINGS.

THERE is more activity among the artists now than for some months past, and canvas is suffering by the square yard.

Joseph D. Strong's portraits in pastel have become exceedingly popular, and justly so, because they are excellently done, and the likenesses are phenomenal. At the Century Club's exhibition on Wednesday night, Mr. Strong exhibited some of his pastels, which were highly commended.

Marion Wells has completed a bust of Uncle George Bromley, life size, for the Bohemian Club, and it now occupies a place in the social room. Both bust and pedestal are exquisitely executed. Some are of the opinion that the expression of the humorist's face is too severe, but Uncle George's features in repose are naturally stern. There is quite a demand among his friends for replicas of the work. The design on the pedestal represents Uncle George performing his functions as High Priest of the club.

Charles Rollo Peters is working most industriously in Monterey, and is principally devoting himself to the expression of moonlights. All of his work shows a marked improvement and careful study. Mr. Peters chases the pale out of the night in all her phases, and his effects are full of sentiment and harmony.

Joseph A. Harrington has completed a picture of the Divine Savior for St. Rose's Church which is a masterpiece. Although Mr. Harrington's pictures of scriptural subjects have all been meritorious, he has excelled his previous efforts in this work. The features are earnest, kind and noble, the pose is Godlike, and the coloring rich, but well balanced. It is a valuable addition to the high art of this city, strong and imposing, yet full of humanity. The congregation of St. Rose have secured an art treasure.

Bloomer is working hard on the scenery of Marin county.

Experience is the best teacher, after all. To those who are getting up dinners, parties, baquets, or any similar sort of function, the great experience of Mr. Max Abraham will prove that he knows exactly how to cater to the most refined and exclusive taste. All the swell set employ him, and he always gives satisfaction.

Miss Ray Fromberg and Mrs. Ray Levin have opened a millinery store at 104 Stockton street. The young ladies are proficient in their art, and have many friends who will be pleased to hear of their success.

MAN AND A THEORY.

"I HAVE a theory," said Hawkins. We all moved our chairs closer. Hawkins' beer was poor, his tobacco bad, and his studio old. But Hawkins himself was sometimes seriously amusing. We had been conversing on love.

"I think," he continued, "that love is mutual respect, expanded to the utmost. Marriage is the public declaration of love. And how could a man wish to wed a woman he did not respect! And how could a man respect a woman who did not conduct herself with propriety!"

Kay and I exchanged smiles. Hawkins had changed since his Latin Quarter days. And was it hard to guess now that his remarks were allusive to the daughter of Gen. Waldgrave, the wealthy connoisseur, where Hawkins often called when his dress suit was not represented by a ticket?

No one attempted to demolish or sustain Hawkins' hypothesis. But de Guré, the violinist, who never was known to keep on one subject ten minutes, inquired:

"Where's your picture for the Art Club's mid-winter exhibition?"

"There," answered Hawkins, pointing to a canvas on an easel, covered with a piece of green baize.

"May we see it?"

"Certainly," and Hawkins stepped over and removed the cloth.

"What's it called?" asked Jones.

"Why, 'The Will o' the Wisp,'" replied Hawkins, with a hit of petulance.

"New way of treating the subject," Kay remarked.

And so it was. A slender girl, clothed in a piece of gauze and a wreath, was tempting a moony youth into an inky-looking swamp. The light in the picture all came from the girl's gorgeous red hair.

"Wait till Roberts, the critic, gets hold of that," said Jones encouragingly.

"Well," said Hawkins, "I hope he'll give me a few good words. If it's a go. I know where I can unload it. And I am financially at low-water mark."

"Who's the model?" I asked of Kay, as Hawkins covered his work.

"Annie McCarthy," he answered. "Isn't she a star?" Then to Hawkins, "Say, Hawk, I haven't seen Annie for a long time. How long has she been posing for you?"

"Four—five months."

"What?"

"You see," Hawkins explained, "I wish to do my very best work—and—and—well, you see—"

"I see," said Kay. "Got a match?"

* * * * *

It was raining hard the night of the private view of the midwinter exhibition of the Art Club. I only went round to see how Hawkins' picture had been placed. Jones had told him that the club roof had been raised three feet to accommodate odd stuff, and the poor little fellow was in a very nervous state.

I ran round the gallery until I came to "The Will o' the Wisp." It wasn't exactly skied, but most emphatically it wasn't on the line. I stopped short, for there was Roberts looking up at it.

Of all the old cranks that ever used a pen, Roberts was the peer. His thin set lips and frowning brow boded no good to Hawkins' work. In fact, I was sufficiently near to hear him mutter a decided "Rotten!" Just then there passed me quickly a tall, slight girl, with a mass of red hair. She went directly to Roberts and touched his arm.

"Annie McCarthy," he exclaimed; "you here!"

"Yes, I came round just to see Mr. Hawkins' picture. Isn't it lovely?"

"H'm—er—yes, yes; very good."

"I'm so glad you think so, for you'll surely say something nice about it in the papers."

"Er—er—yes, yes, of course."

"Well, I must go now. But I'm very glad that I saw you, I know you always mean what you say," and she dropped her eyes.

"May I escort you to the door?" The gallantry of his younger days was returning.

"If you wish," without raising her eyes.

They went down the broad stairway into the front hall. I followed them only for a lark. Downstairs the gas had not been lighted. I suppose it was necessary for him to lean over her to hear in the darkness. Anyway, it must have been very nice, for I heard her giggle.

"May I see you home?" he requested.

"Oh, my brother's outside waiting for me. Good-night, Mr. Roberts! I'll be sure to read all the papers to-morrow."

"Yes, yes. Good-night."

And she went out into the street, where a big Irishman took charge of her.

Roberts stood gazing out into the night for a few moments, and then returned slowly to the gallery. The stairs hid me. At the same time, I heard a profane ejaculation behind me, and I turned to see Hawkins dash into the coat-room.

* * * * *

Roberts didn't strain himself much in the next morning's Herald. There was something about "new ideas," "good technique," and "brilliant future," but nothing that burned. I was strolling down the avenue that afternoon, when I met Hawkins.

"Good luck," I said, holding up the paper.

"Yes," he puffed, "sold the picture—Waldgrave—my own price. Great hurry; see you later," and he rushed away.

I went up to Kay's studio in the evening for a quiet pipe.

"Funny thing," Kay remarked.

"What?"

"This afternoon Hawkins announced his engagement to Miss Annie McCarthy."—Dan Gibbs in the Quartier Latin.

A Certain farmer, who is by no means noted for his resemblance to Apollo, has a son of seven who possessed more wit than pedigree. One day a stranger came to the farm, and, seeing the lad, asked: "Sonny, where's your father?" "In the pig pen," was the reply. "In the pig pen? Thanks!" And, as the man moved in the direction indicated, the boy shouted: "I say! You'll know him, 'cause he's got a hat on!"—Tid-Bits.

CHARLES GRAEF & CO., the well-known United States agents for the famous Pommery Sec, Appolinaris Water, etc., have opened a Pacific Coast branch at 21 Sutter street, under the management of Mr. John Caffrey. This branch will keep fresh arrivals of Pommery and the other specialties of this noted firm. Pommery Sec is so well known and so popular amongst connoisseurs that praise is needless. It was used at the recent banquet to Judge McKenna, and is a favorite wine at all banquets and society dinners. Its richness and pungency of flavor appeals at once to the refined and critical taste, as may be judged from the fact that it is the favorite wine of the nobility, the clubman, at the banquet, and, certainly, of fashionable society, both in the United States and Europe.

THE ART EPICUREAN.

(FIFTH PAPER.)

TUESDAY afternoon I penetrated to the holy of holies "between decks" at the Palace hotel when the McKenna banquet committee, headed by ex-Surveyor-General Theodore Reichert turned down a candidate or graciously accorded him the happy privilege, for his shining silver, to sup with the mighty. The suggestive-looking tin hox at the General's side was fairly bulging with the good store within—perhaps a premonition of the state of the donors later on. The head of the invitation committee had his wits about him, and the checking up process went merrily on, with the aid of United States Marshal Barry Baldwin, present, perchance, to see the awful tragedy safely through; and although Richard Chretien tried some of his winning ways on the strong hox, the Marshal's double-barreled vision, supplemented by the General's pince-nez was too much for even his temerity.

Attorney T. J. Crowley peeped in for a moment, soon followed by his friend and office chum, Colonel Kowalsky; and, in an aside, it has been whispered that when these two cronies get away into the woods camping, they give reins to their culinary ambitions, and such dishes as result would put Delmonico's chef to blush. But Mr. Crowley modestly tells me, "Oh, yes, the Colonel and I share the honors; he does the cooking and I wash the dishes." I fancy there is another side to that pretty little tale, and the next time the two take to the woods a spy should be appointed from among the fraternity to see what wood sprite weaves a spell over their hacon and hard tack that makes it into such delicious dainties as report saith.

Soon the candidates began to flock in in such numbers that room was at a premium, and so I sought out Manager Warren, who paused in his husy bustling long enough to graciously describe to me the arrangement of the tables set for the banquet in the main dining room—the eighty-foot one at which Chairman Colonel Jackson presided, and the eight smaller ones at right angles to it—and then accorded me a peep at the menu, which looked vastly appetizing, even just after the luncheon hour, and included:

Eastern Oysters on the half-shell
Windsor Clear Soup
Olives, Celery, Salted Almonds, Caviar
Grenadin of Salmon Trout, Sauce Mirabeau
Potatoes Chatelaine
Filet of Beef, larded, a la Intendant
Croustade of Sweetbreads, Garnishe Metternich
Champagne Punch
Roast Chicken
Romaine Tomato Salad
New Peas
Biscuit Glace
Cafe Noir

White and red California wines and Moët & Chandon, Pommery, and Mumm were served at the banquet. In glancing over the array, a happy thought came to me. Could I prevail upon Manager Warren to let me see his chef? I could. That croustade of sweetbreads I simply must have, and if I could induce chef Morgenthaler to list to my pleadings, the day was mine. Handed over to the tender mercies of an attendant, after devious windings and bravely opening of grim "no admittance" doors, the heart of the hostelry—the kitchen—was reached, and there, calmly supervising the operations of a brigade of white-capped assistants, the portly chef reigned supreme.

I meekly presented my petition—my thirst for knowledge. He smiled benignly, and in broken French, with infinite patience, penetrated my density with the following recipe for croustade of sweetbreads:

Make the croustade with a pancake hatter, using the metal dies in any preferred form—he has hearts, cloverleaves, diamonds, etc., in his fully-equipped kitchen. The garniture Metternich is made with kernels of lamb-sweetbreads, truffles, mushrooms, chicken livers, combs, and kidneys of capons, all mixed in chicken suprême white sauce.

For this, chef Morgenthaler, we thank you. As I listened to his description, out of the corner of my eye I saw two of his underlings skewering larded chicken livers. I wanted to take the second degree on that, hut with the thermometer at ninety, even the delight of wrestling toothsome recipes is apt to wilt. But in passing, a few words of more detailed description of the croustade might he well. This crust is made so delicately thin as to be almost wafer-like, and haked to a golden brown with the die to give it form. The garnish must be mixed very thoroughly and each separate ingredient chopped fine.

It has been said that the ladies of to-day are far too apt to relegate all the worry and responsibility of the table to their servants, and that few in this city care enough about cooking to enter into the preparation of any dish with half the zest of their spouses. Several ladies have assured me that they leave everything to their cooks, and do not even dare to ask the kitchen divinity how she makes a certain dish, for they are quite confident that she will diplomatically evade the point, and in the end give no information. Such ladies are not the mistress of their homes. The royal personage in the kitchen should have that title.

Yet there are several society ladies who take an interest in the making of some little dish, and among them might be mentioned one of the belles of the city, Miss Laura McKinstry, whose wise mother has always held the belief that California women are far too dependent upon the goddess of the kitchen, and therefore allow many de-relections of duty because they are really in a state of dependence upon her coming or going. Mrs. McKinstry strongly advocates a knowledge of cookery and house supervision generally, for only by such a course can a mistress properly care for her home and family and be independent. The Judge's wife and daughter are both makers of delightful salads, and a Welsh rarebit from the fair hands of Miss Laura has a relish that could never be given it by one of the sterner sex.

It has always seemed that a woman's hands never appear to better advantage than when preparing some chafing-dish dainty; and usually the clever woman knows it. It makes a man long to pop the question then and there, and as a vehicle toward matrimony can be recommended as far in advance of piano playing or even em-hroidery, for it does have such a housewifely air, and what living man could resist the suggestions that come surging up in his mind at the pretty picture. And when he tastes the dainty his fate is sealed, for it is sure to be a success; fair woman is too wary to attempt anything for man's digestion that would be apt to wreak ruin upon it. She knows its value to the owner.

Speaking of a Welsh rarebit, Mrs. Will E. Fisher can prepare one to a nicety, and the other day, just before the guests began to arrive for the Martha Washington tea for which she had thrown open her lovely home, she kindly gave me the modus operandi, which is:

First grate the cheese very fine, putting a tablespoonful of butter into a chafing dish, and, when hot, sprinkling in the cheese, a small portion at a time, and adding the heer (Mrs. Fisher prefers the Schlitz brand) a tablespoonful at a time, stirring it all the time, and adding paprica for seasoning. Her preference is to let it come to a boil, and then spread it upon buttered toast instead of cracker—the usual way. Chocolate is an appetizing accompaniment to the rarebit, and just the thing for a nightcap after the theatre.

Captain and Mrs. Burns, whose beautiful home at the corner of Washington and Hyde streets is the scene of some delightful entertainments, are both fond of preparing some little dish when the mood suggests, and the Captain rather prides himself upon his culinary achievements.

The family five o'clock tea is a pretty English custom, where a visitor chancing to call may find a cup of tea over whose aroma a social chat might be enjoyed, and under whose benign influence the fatigue of an afternoon's calls might be partially overcome. But this mode of entertaining does not prevail to any extent in this city, for we have not (or think we have not) the leisure for it; and husbands and brothers whose presence would tend to enliven the hour are usually in their offices at that time in the mercantile world. Some day, when the mad rush for wealth has subsided, and we are willing to sit down and enjoy our thousands without still martyrizing ourselves for the yellow god, these little daytime social features may be introduced, and once launched, continue to float upon the wave of society, hut if I were you I should not select my five o'clock tea-table furnishings just yet, for fashions might change before that blissful time arrives.

THE allowance of $25.00 per day for each of the experts, who are going over the accounts of the State Printing Office is entirely disproportionate to the service being performed as the ability of the experts to earn it.
 It is extremely doubtful if any of them ever made more than that much per week, before this lucky windfall.

THE Rev. Dr. Fraser declared at the ministers' meeting last Monday that it made his "blood boil to sit here and hear Professor Howison express his views on religion." Certainly; to be sure! No doubt Brother Fraser would like to see every man drawn and quartered who would refuse to endorse his lamb-like and charitable brand of soul-saver. What a striking illustration of Christly toleration and kindness is this same Brother Fraser.

PRESIDENT McKinley announced in his inaugural address on Thursday that he would convene Congress in extra session on the 15th inst. Inasmuch as we are to have more tariff tinkering, the earlier the disturbance commences the more quickly will the country recover from its alarming effects. This is one of the inevitable consequences of Republican success, and must be borne with whatever patience the people may possess.

THE comparative table of mortality accompanying the recent report of the Board of Health, is rather startling. The table includes thirty-five cities, ranging in population from Raleigh, N. C., with 13,000, to St. Louis, with 570,000. The highest death rate is credited to Memphis, at 26.39, the lowest, San Diego, at 6.6. San Francisco stands third from the top with 21.92. If these figures are correct it is time that attention were given to the sanitary condition of this city. No stronger argument for a thorough system of sewerage can be made than a death rate of 21.92.

MAYOR PHELAN voiced public opinion when he remarked, at the meeting of the Supervisors on Monday, that there is at present no occasion for paying $250 per month for an assistant District-Attorney. During the Durrant trial there was need of such an officer, for the office was cumbered with work. There is at this time no such condition. The office can take care of current business without an assistant, whose chief labor would end with the drawing of his salary. There is far too much of this sort of game going on at the City Hall now on the part of these worthy laborers for their own pockets.

THE petition of the Merchants' Association that First avenue—a proposed boulevard connecting the Park and Presidio, and which is to be soon bituminized—should be widened by adding to the roadway ten feet, to be taken from the sidewalks, should be granted by the Supervisors.
 Golden Gate avenue is a very fair illustration of wide walks and narrow roadways. The avenue is frequently gorged with vehicles, while there remains much useless space on the walks on either side. Public utility really demands such a change of the main artery from the city to the Park, as is proposed further away. The chief service of First avenue will be for vehicles and wheelmen, while the sidewalks will be comparatively neglected.

SUPERVISOR ROTTANZI introduced and had unanimously passed by his colleagues, a resolution asking the Legislature to provide a way for the payment of just claims, long overdue to many merchants for supplies furnished to this city and used by it. That these tradespeople have been kept out of their money for years is a great injustice. It is shameful. If any man in business were to treat his creditors half so badly, he would be ostracised.

THE Supreme Court has affirmed the decision of the Lower Court in the case of Theodore Durrant, and it is reasonably certain that he will at last be hanged for the terrible crime of which he was charged. That the judgment is a righteous one the evidence, although entirely circumstantial, clearly established. Now that the way has been broken we may hope that the other malefactors whose necks are but little less worthy of the halter than his may speedily follow him to the gibbet.

IT is to be regretted that the Sundry Civil bill carries an amendment restoring to the public domain eleven of the thirteen forest reservations recently withdrawn by President Cleveland. The withdrawals covered more than 20,000,000 acres of forest areas. The President's action was wise, and more than justified by the history of forests in other lands. Except some stringent measures be employed to preserve the trees of America, in a comparatively short time we shall have no timber to care for. Few people have knowledge of the rapid denudation of lands in this country. President Cleveland's act should stand.

THE Carnival Committee expects to be able to give work to a considerable body of the city's unemployed at an early day. A large number of floats must be built, and there will be other work for those who need it.
 The money subscribed for that week's grand holiday will in a hundred ways prove to be a benefit; it will serve a double purpose, and those who contribute to the successful accomplishment of the carnival may feel sure that they are making a paying investment. The carnival will bring thousands to the city, will advertise the attractions of San Francisco in a lasting manner, and will directly benefit every line of business.

COMPLETION of the Alameda and San Joaquin Railroad and its opening to traffic is an important event in the history of manufacturing in San Francisco. The line will connect the Corral Hollow coal mine with this city by way of Stockton, and should result in the introduction of cheap fuel for steam making. The question of coal for manufacturing purposes in San Francisco is a most important one. The Corral Hollow mine being near by, and its output capable of great expansion, it will exert an important influence on the cost of that article. The Southern Pacific has given the company a rate of one cent per ton per mile on its product to all points in California.

CALIFORNIA could do much worse with $50,000 than to appropriate that sum toward a proper display of the State's resources at the Trans-Mississippi International Exposition, which takes place at Omaha four months hence. The Nebraska capital is the center of a populous region, and the Exposition will doubtless be visited by hundreds of thousands from the middle Western States. Congress has granted $200,000 in aid of the Omaha venture, and there is a bill pending at Sacramento carrying $50,000 for providing a fair representation of California products there. The middle West is near by, and this State should be able to turn the faces of many immigrants westward by an exhibition of native resources.

THE INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

ON Thursday Major William McKinley drove down Pennsylvania avenue, lined on each side by as brilliant a display of handsome men, beautiful women, and gorgeous attires, as ever the American continent witnessed. Arrived at the capitol he took the simple form of oath provided for such occasions, and forthwith Cleveland was out, and McKinley was in. It is not worth while to say more of the pageantry that accompanied the event, except, perhaps, to remark the wide departure from simplicity and good taste the country has witnessed since the President rode down unaccompanied to the capitol, bitched his horse to a post, stepped into the building, took the necessary oath, and returned as unostentatiously as he came. That represented republican simplicity; what the display of last Thursday, to see which as much as $4,000 for a window on the line of march was paid, represented, it is bard to say in that spirit of kindness one would like to apply to everything pertaining to the inauguration of our new President.

It fortunately happens that the pageant was hut the outward show that had little to do with the inward thing. The scepter of power had passed from one to another, without the slightest hitch, difficulty, or doubt and all because the people had so willed. The highest act of popular sovereignty was performed; one administration bad, with the calmness of a judicial act, succeeded another, and affairs of State went on as before. What a difference between this easy and regular transference of power and that which in England led to the long war of the Roses! It has been said that the American people will not always conduct their Presidential successions with peace and certainty. But they have passed through a severe test on that point. They could bardly have a more trying experience than they had in 1876, when the man whom it is now generally agreed was not elected, was given the office. Mr. Hayes was as peaceably inaugurated as if he had been unquestionably elected. His opponent, Samuel J. Tilden, was among the first to acquiesce in the decision of a tribunal that was clearly partisan. It was held to be better, far better, to concur in the seating of the wrong man, than to engage in a civil war. It is sometimes said to be a mistake not to inaugurate a President immediately after his election. But there is another side to that question. The contest excites much feeling on both sides, and it is well that this should be permitted to cool off before any decided action becomes necessary. It is bardly possible that Hayes could have been inaugurated at any time within a month after election day. Time being given to discuss matters over calmly, and to cool down, he was inaugurated as quietly as any President ever has been. The sober second thought by that time prevailed over conditions as serious as can well be imagined, and a settled belief has grown up that the same kind of thought would prevail everytime and always.

McKinley inaugurated—what next? His cabinet having been named, the only curiosity that exists on that score is to see them at work. Safe, and not brilliant, they have excited no undue expectations, and, therefore, there will be none to disappoint. Sherman will pretty certainly be the first member of the administration to become distinctly unpopular, and that we say although we recognize in him that experience, ability and force which must constitute him the real leader of the administration. But he cannot, in the office he holds, satisfy existng popular opinion, and can take no new departure from the course Cleveland has pursued. Already he is under a cloud, and the sun of what popularity he has, will sink to rise no more until he is dead. We think nothing the worse of him for that, because only "jingoos" are popular, as times go, and we want no jingoos. Nor do we expect to think his unpopularity will be objectionable, seeing that the moh is likely to be about as bad as it could be. The almost unknown Chicago man who has become the Secretary of the Treasury holds what, at this time, is the second most important office in the Cabinet. If we are to believe the friends who worked to get him there, he is a wonder, and will by himself alone redeem the reputation of the administration. It is most sincerely to be hoped that this may prove to be true. Our highest policy at this moment is to leave foreign entanglements alone, and straighten out our finances. Judge McKenna, as Attorney-General, will have to settle the difficulties between the Government and the railroads, and no man is more likely to succeed than he. What of the President himself? An affable, non-committal, kindly disposed man, he may get through his term with less of friction and harassment than a more able man.

Yet he has already piled up troubles for himself that are formidable. He will presently have "Congress on his bands" with a tariff that out Herods-Herod, and fairly distances McKinleyism. It is the almost open and acknowledged payment of the protected trusts that raised the campaign fund. He has antagonized Speaker Reed, who is not a high tariff man, and is hent on mischief. At heart a Silverite, with many speeches to bis credit, McKinley yet was elected on a gold platform and no compromise. With the silver men in the Senate holding the balance of power, it requires no stretch of imagination to conjure up tribulations beyond endurance.

On last Thursday Grover Cleveland became Grover Cleveland. for the second time in his greatest public career a private citizen; and there is very little doubt that he doffed the robes of State with a feeling of profound relief. He retires from the cares of office fortified in the conviction that he has fulfilled his whole duty, and that he has met and discharged every responsibility with the breadth of mind and intuitive grasp of a statesman. That he has unshaken confidence in himself permits of no doubt. He has, through his long public career, shown a degree of resolution and a disregard for quick public opinion that can only accompany a mature element of greatness, and which, given the opportunity, makes and leaves a lasting impression upon the history of the times.

Speaking for the moment, Cleveland goes into retirement the best and most generally disliked ex-President of those who have left the Capitol for many a day. Eight years ago the same statement, only in less degree, might have been made of him. But there existed a wide and vital difference between the conditions surrounding his departure from Washington at that time, and his political environments of 1897. Then at his back stood a united democracy, beaten on the broad issue of the tariff; and Cleveland went down as the leader of that party, and the undeniable champion of that cause and as its logical candidate of four years later. Intervening events did not disturb his prominence nor shake his bold upon the hearts of his followers; and on the 4th of March, 1893, he again rode to the Capitol, by the side of his vanquished opponent, and assumed the reins of government.

Causes with which President Cleveland had nothing to do, hut whose workings were feebly felt at the general election that returned him to the head of affairs, accentuated and aggravated by the grinding financial depression, spread in every direction. False ideas and dangerous political teachings, cleverly veiled by eloquent sophistry misled millions of honest men of both great national parties. The free silver heresy, nominally accepted by the Democratic party, but in reality bitterly opposed by its brains and influence, won the day, and through the fidelity to true democratic principles, which of two evils, chose the lesser one, a Republican President was elected. To this political sacrifice President Cleveland gave his moral support, and contributed materially to the overthrow of threatened financial dishonor and the rescue of the country from the curse of a debased currency.

The great service performed by President Cleveland in refusing to be influenced by the war dance of the jingoos and their constant endeavors to embroil this country with other nations, will perhaps never be appreciated by the masses of the people. He firmly resisted the greatest popular pressure for the extension of public domain, believing with the founders of the republic, that the duty and safety of the Government lay in the development and expansion of trade rather than in the acquisition of foreign territory. His refusal to recognize the struggle of the Cubans has subjected him to severe criticism by the irresponsible and sensational press of the country, both Democratic and Republican, and has added materially to his immediate unpopularity. But dispassionate and intelligent opinion must justify his determination to avoid a rupture with Spain, until cause for conceding belligerent rights to the Cubans become clearly apparent, even as his opposition to the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands as being directly contrary to the genius and traditions of the American Government, must be regarded as the attitude of a statesman and patriot.

The part that Cleveland will play in the future political and material history of the United States is problematical — made doubly so by reason of the anomalous alignment of parties within the past year. But it may be safely said of him that his great influence will be felt and his voice heard in the councils of the old Democratic organization. When the future historian writes the record of the last quarter of the present century, the strong character, the rugged integrity and forceful personality of Grover Cleveland will be accorded an honorable and conspicuous place among the patriots and statesmen of the republic.

The Powers Of The Speaker And President. The people of these United States rather like the exercise of authority, if they but have confidence in the man who wields it. They were so enamored of the successful audacity of Speaker Reed a few years ago, that they were almost ready to intrust him with any power to rule the House and its business, and for a time it looked as if he were to be the candidate of his party for President. The way in which he counted in quorums, made light of traditions, and overthrew rules was something wonderful to behold, but that mattered little to Reed. Outside opinion acquiesced, if it did not positively approve, because it enabled a very small majority to hasten on the accomplishment of its will, and to really do something. Among other things, it enabled the so-called McKinley tariff to be passed almost without debate. The Congress with the smallest party majority of modern times, got through with more work than any of them, and as "the billion dollar Congress" gained notoriety, as Mr. Reed himself said, for discovering the fact that "this is a billion dollar country." McKinley was made chairman of the Ways and Means committee, which became the right of way, as it were, to the Presidency, by this self same Speaker Reed. But a great many things have happened since then. McKinley is now the President who can be harassed, and be put into all sorts of inconvenient positions, but Reed is again Speaker, and entrenched in power as never before. He is King of the principal law making House, whilst McKinley is but its chief executive officer. Between the two men there is now no love lost. Reed is the abler of the two, and far the safer man to rely upon in a fight. He is clearly bent on digging pit holes for his opponent, and means mischief. There will probably soon be a contest for the reorganization of the Rules Committee. If the Speaker holds his own "he will be a bigger man than the President."

The Russian Enigma. An interesting question is that one solving itself in Russia. We say solving itself, advisedly, for Russian purposes and diplomacy are not permitted, wittingly, to be solved by any one but Russia. So far as the character of the present ruler is developed, it is evident that Nicholas II. is no exception to the rule. Before his coronation we were treated in public prints with elaborate statements of his peculiarities. His disagreement with the traditional tyranny of Russian rule; the despair of his father because of his liberal tendencies; that he was a pale and studious young man who held in his heart as well as in his hand the enfranchisement of the peasantry, and predictions of rapid and radical changes from autocracy to constitutionalism in his government. Since he placed the diadem of all the Russias upon his own brow, we have heard many rumors of his personal weaknesses. His subjection to the whims of his wife and mother; his physical and mental deterioration; his abject fear of nihilists; his nerveless collapse from the tragedy on Hodynsky plain, and pictures of him closely guarded in his palace of Gatschina or trembling at every sound in Tsarskor-selo. How much of all this is true and how much false, is a difficult question in these days of journalistic "enterprise." Outside of the prattle with which the papers fill space there are some significant facts worthy of notice. Someone is pushing the most stupendous railway project of the age across Siberia to the Pacific. Some one is building Russian lines across China, and has completed conventions which enables Russians to build Chinese lines. Someone is visibly tightening the Russian grasp on Korea and the Manchurian provinces. Someone is keeping a firm Muscovite hold on the Turkish situation which the whole of jealous Europe dreads not loosen. Italy looked to St. Petersburg for countenance in her disastrous Abyssinian enterprise, France explodes with joy at the least show of Russian favor, while the war-lord of Germany is almost abject in his obsequiousness to the Czar. The pale young man has visited all the important capitals of Europe and does not seem to have lost prestige with the trained diplomacy of his hosts. Recent dispatches indicate a decided tendency toward a liberal policy for the Russian press and people. Inspired organs of the empire, once bitter against the Catholics of Poland, are now talking of conciliation. The Czar has lately declined to sentence unruly students of Moscow, whom his august father would have quickly dispatched in chains to Siberia. If all these things are not directly attributable to the emperor, it is hard to say who is their responsible cause, especially when we notice that the Czar seems to prefer to rule without a chancellor. A constitution would be the natural result of advancing civilization, and Russia is surely advancing. Nicholas II. has the splendid opportunity to give political freedom to 130 millions of subjects. To do so he will need to be strong, for he will encounter the bitter opposition of a most conservative nobility. To complete the marvelous developments of Asia, and to be in fact, as in name, the "little father" of his people, will be to make the pale young man the peer of all his illustrious progenitors. Has he the strength? There are indications that he has, and there are rumors that he has not. That is the Russian enigma.

Making Specific Contract Laws. During the war, California had what ultimately became very familiar as "the specific contract law." It was intended to meet the legal tender quality of the greenback. It specifically provided that all contracts should be paid in the kind of money agreed upon between the parties. Thus it came that all our checks, notes, drafts, etc., were made to read "payable in United States gold coin." The United States Constitution then and now provided that "no State should ever pass any law to invalidate contracts." An appeal was taken to the United States Supreme Court, and the Constitution was, of course, sustained. Now come some seven or eight of the recently admitted States, with enactments providing that all contracts, no matter what they specify, shall be paid in silver. That will be all right in cases where payment in silver is nominated in the bond, and is so understood by both parties, but who will be foolish enough to make silver contracts at gold prices? Those of the people in the silver States who are careful to make gold contracts will have to be paid in gold, and no law of the State can abrogate that right. Moreover, until there be free and unlimited coinage of the white metal at a ratio of sixteen to one, no contracts to pay in the silver coinage of the United States would benefit the debtor. There is nothing to be made by such contracts so long as the Government maintains its white and yellow coins at a parity, which President McKinley and his party are pledged to do.

The Concert Of Europe. What a miserable combination that wretched "concert of Europe" is, to be sure! Undertaken from good motives, its policy has proven despicable, and its course that of a protector of the worst of tyrannies. Its avowed purpose is to maintain the statu quo, or things as they are, in Europe. The guarantee for which is that the six great powers of Europe are bound by solemn treaty to unite in preventing by war, if necessary, any dismemberment of any European country as it now exists. The Armenians may not clear their country of their slaughtering enemies, nor the Cretans hold possession of the land they have redeemed from the enthrallment of their old-time persecutors. The barbarity and wholesale slaughter of the Christian by the Turk must continue, because the six great Christian powers desire for a time, at least, to preserve peace all round. It is a most tyrannous arrangement that shocks humanity, and causes a great many good men and women to marvel at what can be done in the name of Christianity in these latter days. History records nothing more inhuman than the recent slaughtering by the Turk, yet they would cease at once, if the "concert of Europe" but said they must. Yet by the terms of the unholy alliance in which Europe is bound, it cannot say that word, but must say the opposite. Cruel, blood-stained wrong must be protected, and every God-given right be suppressed, because it suits the present convenience of certain outsiders to have it so. That people of England, of France, of Italy and probably of Germany would quickly break up this wicked "concert" in which their rulers have involved them, if they could. And it is not unlikely that they will, anyhow. Englishmen are ashamed of the attitude of their Government, and if a leader of the opposition, like Gladstone, were but to give the word, the tight little Island would be an armed camp within a week. The people of France, as well as those of Italy, are even more heated over the use their Governments are being put to than the English. Emperor William is hearing some very ugly grumblings among his people, and, like King George of Greece, may yet find it necessary to follow his subjects, or lose his throne. He has an abscess in his ear, whilst Nicholas has one on his brain. That the "concert" of Europe cannot long be maintained by such incurables goes without saying. Without the people, war cannot last long. Christianized, civilized Europe will never fight to the end to put Greece, Crete, Macedonia, Armenia, Kurdistan, etc. under the heel of the unspeakable Turk. The day of their emancipation is at hand, and it will either directly, or indirectly, result from the breaking away of the nationalities indicated from the so-called "concert." The press despatches make it appear that King George will fight, and only surrender to the actual force of arms, as demonstrated on the field. More power to him! He has but to stick to that course and the "concert" of Europe will be his.

Pure Food Laws. There has been a rather noticeable reluctance upon the part of the authorities to prosecute the dealers who were arrested some time ago for having sold impure food in this city. It is difficult to understand upon fair grounds why there should be the least hesitancy in bringing these cases to immediate trial, for the public health is endangered by the lax administration of the laws. The Board of Health has shown commendable vigor in ferreting out the dealers of impure food products, and should be backed up promptly by the courts, as it is by public opinion. The man who sells any article of diet, knowing it to be impure or anything other than as it is represented, is more a criminal than he who issues counterfeit coins. In the latter case only financial loss is suffered by the victims, while in the former case health and life are placed in jeopardy, and honest goods discounted. Thus it is a fraud and a swindle in a double sense. The proposition is so plain—the evils so apparent, that to argue upon it is a waste of words. By consent of the prosecutors and the Judges, the cases now booked for trial have been assigned to Judge Campbell's court. The people will watch with interest the progress of these cases, and they expect that every effort consistent with justice will be made to punish the guilty to the law's fullest extent. If those arraigned are innocent, the fact should be known; if not, then they should be branded as dishonored and dishonest tradesmen.

The White Women Of Chinatown. The NEWS LETTER would not knowingly do anybody an injustice, and certainly it would not say a word calculated to wound women of good intentions. Last week we referred to the evil that had crept into Chinatown through the employment there of house to house visitors and teachers of our own race. These women roamed all over Chinatown in the guise of teachers sent out by one or other of the local missionary societies. It is certain that they soon became scholars rather than teachers. They became adepts in the ways that are dark and tricks that are vain of the heathen Chinese. We had always understood, until this last week, that they were duly accredited agents of some more or less responsible society. But we are now assured that this class of women lacked any sort of creditable credentials, were acting solely on their own account, and had for some time been under suspicion by more than one of the regular societies. Of course, if the women we have in mind had no employment, and no status under any of the well-known and duly constituted societies, that, of course, exonerates them, but that statement we know to be not altogether true. If is nearer true than it was, but is not altogether true yet. There are young women, supposed to be under the sheltering wings of certain missionary societies, who are in some manner licensed to go around among the young Chinese merchants, and who teach them a new way to defeat Little Pete's and Big Jim's monopoly. We say that this desperate evil of white women traffic in Chinatown began some sixteen years ago, through the agency of women who certainly did have some sort of recognition from societies beyond reproach. Whilst recent happenings have focussed attention once again upon that black spot in our midst, the iniquities of which are not yet half known, there must be, and there shall be, a more thorough disinfection and fumigation of Chinatown than it has ever yet received. To the missions we say withdraw all your wandering minstrels right away. The dark ways of Chinatown are not fit avenues for them. Said one of the oldest Presbyterian ministers to us the other day: "It is not a place in which I should like a sister or daughter of mine to be employed." Why, then, should he and his associates like to have "the sisters and daughters" of other men there? Can he, and they, ever compensate them for the contumely that is morally sure to follow them all their days?

Strike at The Examiner. Congress is usually very ticklish about how it handles the press. In times past it has known that it generally has received pains for its gains. When, however, it without fear seizes the nettle danger without the slightest fear of the consequence, its old-time sting must surely be gone. The House the other day, on the motion of Aldrich, of Illinois, promptly passed a bill directed at the Journal and Examiner, constituting it a misdemeanor to publish an account of a prize-fight, or of any proceedings had in connection therewith. It will get through the Senate, if there be time, which is hardly likely. But the fact will remain that the popular branch of the National Legislature has declared the Examiner's contract with the pugilists a crime that ought to be suppressed by law. The NEWS LETTER last week took the ground that as California had suppressed prize-fighting within its territory, it was in spirit, if not in essence, a violation of law to encourage its existence just over the border, and spread all its details, both by picture and letter press, within the prohibited State. Of course the intent, purpose, and effect cut no figure in Mr. Hearst's mind. The winning of the nickels of the mob are the means which sanctify all his ends. But the nickels will not endure as long as that slur by the House of Representatives. Moreover, society is improving, and the day is at hand when the promoter of pugilism will have to go herd with the pugs. The page which the Examiner daily devotes to the ring at Carson, and to its attachments, is the deepest disgrace that has yet attached to journalism. Meanwhile, the quiet boycott by heads of families and other decent folk is on.

It is also noted that the boycott is not confined to this State, but the Trustees of the Public Library at Portland have decided that the Examiner is unfit for general circulation, and have struck it from the files of that institution. By this act Portland has shown a discrimination that might be followed with profit by every other public library in the country. The immoral influence of that paper is sufficient to contaminate any circle in which it circulates, and its whole policy and direction pander to the lowest instincts of humanity. Not only is it vicious in its sensational features, but its deeper motives are always insincere and usually dishonorable. It often employs a thin veil of public good to hide its malevolence and cover its revenge; but its venal character is so well known that its power for evil in this particular direction is not to be feared. Evidently the methods of the disreputable new journalism, with its sensations, its bribe-takings, its fakings, are finding their true level and estimation on the Pacific Coast.

THE ART EPICUREAN.

(SIXTH PAPER.)

"WHEN lovely woman stoops to folly," and puckers her pretty brows over the literature of Juliet Corson, Mrs. Kohrer, Christine Terhune Herriek, or some other of those blessed and rare women who thoroughly understand the art of cookery, it is usually time for the head of the house to drop into the family physician's office on his way down town, and suggest to him to become particeps criminis next day by "happening" out to make a friendly call.

Yet there isn't a man, with a fondness for the womanly woman, who does not adore his pretty wife all the more when she appears before his astounded vision in a masquerading costume of big apron, sleeves rolled up above her pink elbows, and a tiny smudge of flour on the tip of her little tip-tilted nose—that last is always essential—and announces that she is going to make a dessert for dinner to-day with her own hands. But oh, the aftermath! He dare not decline a second service of the delicacy that his sweet wife has been at such pains to prepare, and yet the most awful visions of future agony confront him as he perjures his immortal soul by blithely announcing that he would like to prevail upon her to help him to just a trifle more of that delicious dessert.

Which, I fear is not a very auspicious preamble for a recipe for a dessert that is a gem and a rarity, and which is made by the most charming woman in San Francisco, who has the reputation for delicious surprises for the last course of her equally charming menus. By the way, have you ever noticed that a man seldom tries his hand at anything in the sweets line, and rarely chooses a dessert dish as a favorite, yet nevertheless he seldom declines it at the table?

But let us to this recipe for blackberry cream that doubtless some of the NEWS LETTER's readers have tasted and recognize as having been served in all its perfection at this fair chatelaine's table. One reason for its rarity is because the blackberries must be fresh wild ones—the cultivated berry lacks the tartness and indescribable flavor that is found in the wild berry.

Take one quart of the wild blackberries, mash them, and sweeten with one-half a pint of sugar. Beat the whites of four eggs to a froth; then stir the berries and eggs together and set in the oven until nicely browned. When finished, place in the refrigerator until perfectly cold. Then whip a pint of rich cream until thick, and spread over the pudding just before serving. For those who like the flavor, a little Burgundy will make a pleasant addition. The success of this dessert is enhanced by the fact that it can be taken by the most delicate digestion, and is very nutritious as well.

As the Hebrew writes—the reverse from the usual way—so we take our menu; and after dessert a delicious soup comes to mind. Have you ever heard of that charming bachelors' hall out on Bush street, where the best cook in San Francisco presides over the gastronomic destinies of three young men who are au fait in everything pertaining to the art epicurean—Hugo Toland, R. Porter Ashe, and Ed Mizner? Those bachelor quarters are sybaritic in their luxurious furnishings, and the own particular "den" of each member of the trio has an individuality that is a sure index—if one wished to observe and deduct. In one room, for instance, is a grill over the folding doors that is a study in the picturesque arrangement of Indian weapons, paddles, snow-shoes, wampum—all in the sombre coloring that somehow suggests the personality of the stoics of this new country. Another corner is a glimpse of Japan, and the inlaid tables, wrought metal lamps, and embroidered screens make one involuntarily peer about for the almond-eyed daughter of the almond-tree land, who ought to complete the picture. And, speaking of pictures, there is a work of art—But there; it was soup we were looking for, was it not? You shall have it.

The caterer to the digestive delight of this household is from the southland, and having been an accomplished cook since she was eleven years old, is past mistress in the art. Some of her recipes she would not reveal for love or money—a certain Roman punch is one (and who can blame her)—but she was good enough to give me in detail the recipe for a filet gumbo that has not a duplicate in the city.

The filet can be procured at your grocer's, but Miss Stewart gets hers direct from New Orleans. The filet is a ground herb, you know, like saffron.

The stock for this soup can be made by taking a chicken (not necessarily a young one this time), unjointing it, and frying in a roux of browned flour and butter—or home-made lard (she prefers the lard that she tries out herself), to which a little onion has been added. Saute the fowl in this roux. Take plenty of time in the preparation of this, for haste results in disaster. Add to this three quarts of water, and let it cook down gradually to two quarts, gently simmering. By the time it is so reduced, the chicken will have been sufficiently cooked. This will be an adequate quantity for twelve persons, as the soup is very rich. One-half hour before serving add one cooked crab, not picked from the shell fine, but the meat kept as far as possible intact, thus better retaining the juice. Then add a green onion and a bit of minced parsley. At the last moment crown it with a heaping tablespoonful of filet. This must never be allowed to boil, or the dish will be spoiled, and the soup must be served immediately after adding it. The Southern style is to serve it with rice dry cooked, so that the kernels are separate; the rice, of course, being placed upon a separate dish.

Okra is sometimes used instead of the filet to give the thickening quality, but only when it can be procured fresh in the summertime is it a success; the dry herb is not satisfactory.

Now, if that bird is ready to walk up to the guillotine, we can discuss the chicken a la Castilian, to which reference was made in a former paper. For this, a young spring chicken is necessary—perhaps a grandchild to the one who met her fate in the soup. Unjoint and saute it much as you would the before-mentioned fowl, only this time the operation must be a quick one, over a hot fire—fifteen minutes ought to suffice. The sauce must be of mushrooms, cooked in about two-thirds of a cupful of white wine, using green Chili peppers—and plenty of them—and strained tomato sauce. A little chopped green onion is also added. If the peppers are not at hand, capsicum, the genuine cayenne pepper, will do for a substitute. Put in your truffles last. The flavor permeates the dish and gives the crowning touch. In parenthesis, do not allow the chicken to be plunged into boiling water to facilitate plucking the feathers—dry picking, as it is called, is the only right way.

While we are on fowl murder bent, perhaps another way of preparing the barnyard beauty will not be amiss—chicken Milanaise. This time the chicken is boiled. After this detail, take the liquid remaining and cook rice in it, adding a bit of saffron, tomato, onion, and green or red peppers. Serve the chicken on a snowy pillow of rice.

I cannot refrain from giving a favorite recipe from Maurice Barrymore, the actor, who is a favorite in San Francisco, but perhaps is not so well known as a gourmet. Oeuf's Commodore is the delicacy that is measured to tickle the Barrymore palate. It is a combination of Sauce Bernaise, poached egg and truffle, the Sauce Bernaise being hot and placed in an individual egg dish, with the poached egg topping it, and crowning the egg a slice of stewed truffle. The egg must be poached in the liquor in which the truffle has been cooked; therein is the secret of the dainty.

One more word, and then we must take off our caps and aprons. You know what a lad Will Ashe is when it comes to dining. He likes to potter among the pots and pans a bit himself on the quiet, and it is whispered that he has such a fondness for a certain dish of his own preparation that when he wants to swear a great, round oath, and all common forms seem meaningless, he ejaculates reverently, "By the sacred mystery of my kidney stew."

AMY L. WELLS.

If you want your tea the same all the year round, get Schilling's Best of your grocer.

If you don't like it, get your money back—of your grocer.

A Schilling & Company
San Francisco.

'We obey no wand but pleasure's.'—Tom Moore.

THAT was a resolute, sensible argument for a San Francisco opera house which Peter Rohertson printed in last Sunday's Chronicle. I hope it will accomplish some good for the cause, but I doubt it. Mr. Rohertson's plea was directed toward the gentlemen who breed dollars—money fanciers—and his hopeful, yet conservative, estimate of the what per centum the investment may be made to yield is not of the sort to strike deep in the pockets of men who ask nothing less of their stock than the nimble fecundity of the rahhit.

Moreover, Mr. Rohertson is an avowed critic of music and the drama, and his pen is necessarily unconvincing to the financier. Far and beyond any personal discomfort, it has always been a sad fact to me that critics are invariably poor. I wonder by what means, and when, and where they part from their incomes! Actors and singers are frequently found wealthy, dramatists live who reek with riches, composers make wills, the hosom of a manager's family is often ablaze with diamonds—but who ever heard of a rich critic? It is all very well to say that the critic, so soon as his pockets are comfortably filled, turns his talents into some more respectable trade, but even granting plausibility to this irreverence, I ask you, did you ever see one of us rich—even though reformed? Have you ever discovered a critic in the act of owning real property, or in any other way identifying himself with the solid men of his community?

The critic's poverty shows either stalwart honesty or a stupendous lack of thrift, or both. It presents the triangular paradox: to be honest is a virtue, to be poor is a crime, to be both is stupid. Still, this is altogether too generous a way of accounting for the average stupidity of the average critic—no such leniency is shown the average actor, singer, or playwright.

It is a dangerous thing to have nothing in particular to write about. I have wandered far from Peter Rohertson and that new opera house. I meant to swing easily into what appears to be the best thing that could possibly happen to us short of an opera house and the singers from the Metropolitan—the season of opera which commences at the California Wednesday night. Thirty gentlemen of wealth, enterprise, and fashion, have each subscribed $1500, making a total of $30,000, to be used as a guarantee fund. Mr. Bouvier represents the guarantors, the Al. Hayman & Co., and himself; Messrs. Friedlander, Gottloh & Marx also have a hand in the management, so it is a very pretty hurst of spirited citizenship all round, almost certain to result in glory to the thirty angels, profit to the management, and a season of holidays for the town. The newspapers are lending enthusiastic columns to keep the good work moving, and it is rumored that the critics all will be equipped with evening clothes, thus avoiding ocular discord at the festivities. I am not informed to what extent the women of the audiences will dress—not very high, let us hope. Big hats will be worn at the owners' risk. Wagner is not to be discussed on the premises. Patti comparisons will not be considered elegant, or tactful. There will be no diagram of the boxes printed on the programmes à la Metropolitan Opera House; and even should there be, it will not be considered the fit thing to paraphrase the old puzzle and say—"Find Herr Bosworth."

Of the company I know as little as anyone else this side of France beyond that it numbers over 140 singers, dancers, musicians and directors, and has just completed a twelve-weeks season of continuous triumph in New Orleans.

The repertory includes a score and more of works running all the way from the naughty comedy of 28 Days of Clairette to the heavy tragedy of the Huguenots. And out of these many operas G. Verdi's serio-comic world-heater, the Trovatore, has been chosen for the opening night. I know what you are saying; I said it myself to Mr. Bouvier. I asked him, "Why Trovatore?"

"Well, I'll be blessed!" he answered. "You wouldn't have a new opera and new singers and an opening all on the same night, would you? You want to hear these people siug—how are you going to do it if your eyes and ears are straining over the color and the sound of the subsidized sevenths and delinquent thirds of a new opera?"

I tried to say that there were Aida and Rigoletto if we absolutely clamored for Verdi and singing, or that even Faust would not attract too much attention from the singers, if the orchestra were toned down. But Bouvier was unmoved. Trovatore, it seems, has found a second youth at the hands of these daring French. And they do not stop with the singing—there is to be a big ballet introduced into Wednesday's performance which it is said to have dimmed the splendor of New Orleans's Mardi Gras. And with the ballet and the audience—and the singing—I dare say we can make out a brilliant first night.

Friday night we are to have L'Africaine, which is almost a novelty in San Francisco; at the Saturday matinee Faust with the ballet and all the company's premières. Miss Helyett for Saturday night.

The prices scale from three dollars down. The seats are now worrying the management more than the dollars—it is a question if there will be enough in the California to go round.

There is good value in the musical act of the Waterbury Brothers and Tenny at the Orpheum. Tenny is a real clown. He does nothing in particular except play the Czarina Mazurka on the clarionette with irresistible caricature, and clown foolishly during the instrumental feats of his colleagues—but if you are amenable to the laws of un-gravity you will laugh to tears. The Waterburys are clever, too, in a quite legitimate way. Their music coincides with the orchestra's—which is rare in a vaudeville act—and the harmony and tone they rub from common table tumblers is a revelation in a musical way. Dudley Prescott, "the human brass hand," who accomplishes with his lips any noise that was ever made, was here several seasons ago. His imitations are admirable, but his comedy monologue is deadly. Here is a man who has been in the variety business for years, doing the same turn and drawing a handsome salary, and all that time his comedy remarks have been blights and hlots on the cleverness of his actual work. There are hundreds like him. And eight dollars given to some poor devil of a writer would buy a skit of incidental conversation that would at least prevent the performer from appearing at anything like his natural disadvantages.

Mr. Hastings of the Orpheum sends me this. It is colloquial, but it is sincere:

We have a corker of a bill next week! If you don't believe it, read the ad. The Jordans are on their way to Australia—five of 'em. John Burke was with Henderson's Aladdin—he took Eddy Foy's place, and is very funny. The Olifans are just from across the water, and their act has turned New York upside down. It is said to be indescribably funny. The sextette from Lucia will be given. Virginia Aragon was here last year, and she is a beautiful wire walker. Dudley Prescott, the Waterbury Brothers and Tenny, and Barney Fagan and Henrietta Byron all have new stuff.

This is the first time I ever caught the Columbia Theatre's press agent in an act of glaring modesty. "There are few better actors in America," he writes, "than Joseph Haworth, and there is no reason why Mr. Haworth should not wear the mantle of the late Alexander Salvini." There are indeed few better actors in America than Haworth, so few in the legitimate line that they do not live; and if it comes to a question of dead men's old clothes, I think Haworth will find Salvini's somewhat small for him. Salvini promised great things; Haworth has accomplished a few. I do not know what Haworth will do with Ruy Blas, in fact I know nothing of his mettle in the romantic beyond what his Mortimer in Mary Stuart suggested. If he lives up to that performance we can ask nothing greater.

The Haworth engagement at the Columbia opens Monday and lasts only a week. Haworth will play the Edwin Booth version of Ruy Blas—the one re-arranged by William Winter. Several members of the Modjeska and Frawley Companies will be in the cast, and Miss Margaret Craven will re-appear again as leading woman. The romance is to be preceded by Gus Thomas's one-act episode, A Man of the World, which Barrymore played at this same theatre two seasons ago.

The Gilbert & Sullivan season goes merrily on at the Tivoli, and once again I have to applaud the chorus and orchestra—this time for their alert work in The Mikado. Not that there are not other good points to the performance, but because the chorus and musicians are so conspicuously excellent. The only fault to be found with the chorus is in its articulation—though, for the matter of that, articulation is not the Tivoli company's strong hold. Hartman is the only member to be always depended upon for a faultless enunciation of the text. A sparkling revival of Pinafore is promised for next week.

Fanny Rice and her company opened in a new bill Thursday night, The Flower Girl of Paris, which will be continued during the two days remaining of her engagement at the Columbia.

Shore Acres has another week to run at the Baldwin. It is too good a play to miss; it marks an epoch in the drama of externals and the utilization of stage children.

I was grieved to learn Thursday afternoon that the permanency of the Symphony concerts now depends on the general public of San Francisco, and the towns around the bay. Messrs. Lilienthal, Lesser and Carrigan have issued a circular in which it is stated that if about six or seven hundred subscribers can be secured who will pay annual dues of from six to twelve dollars (according to location of seats) it will be possible to maintain twelve concerts a year, divided into two seasons. I hope the subscribers will be soon and plentiful. The circular closes with this dread alternative:—"If we should not meet with sufficient encouragement, we propose to abandon the attempt of establishing a Symphony Society in San Francisco."

Trebelli's concerts this afternoon and Tuesday evening, at Golden Gate Hall, will be the only important musical events before the opera opens. She will sing a number of new songs at each concert. Miss Schocht, violiniste (a pupil of Joachim's), and Mr. Sauvlet will assist at the first concert, Miss van der Naillen, Mrs. Hush and Mr. Sauvlet at the second.

There was almost a crowd in the Columbia Thursday afternoon, and everybody got one of the circulars. I am sorry the symphony was not a stronger appeal to the laic music-lovers. The Brahms Symphony (No. 4 in E minor) does not seem to be a work to stir the pulse at a first hearing, and Hinrichs and the musicians (quite like the rest of us) did not approach it with any notable intimacy. However, Brahms never has been famous for cordiality and warmth, and I suppose Hinrichs gave what is known to the vague gentlemen of the press as a "scholarly reading." He brought big splashes of color out of Bizet's Roman Carnival overture, and the Hansel and Gretel fantasia was played with splendid enthusiasm. Trebelli appeared unhappy. She sang the Don Giovanni aria because Hinrichs wanted it, to keep up the classic tone of his programme. And she sang it as though she would rather it had been anything else in the world. I wish it had been.

THE JEWS AND THE BIBLE.

[In Two Papers.—Part Second.]

BY DR. G. A. DANZIGER.

IN viewing the Bible from a religious point, the Jew differs vastly from the Christian. He looks at it as a book as subtle in expression as the tints of the rose; variformed as the flora of a garden; heterogeneous elements made homogeneous by the love of a patriot for his country and by the trend of thought he is privileged to follow. To him it is the most remarkable book that has ever been written; not inspired but inspiring; not the truth, but the repository of great truths; a casket of the most exquisite workmanship, containing jewels of priceless value, and also some dull, lackluster baubles. It is the basis of literary conception, and artistic expression, and because of its various and interesting pictures, scenes, dramas, narratives and proverbs, constitutes the guide of literary taste. Some of its fictions are lovable because of the rhythm and resonance, beauty and fire of their expressions. As one in his senses would not willfully destroy an object of great beauty, so would not a true scholar denude these fictions of their inherent grandeur. No one thinks of taking these grand forms of the Genesis as facts; any more than a student of mythology would think of taking the Olympian battles as historical facts whereon to build an ethical system. But that by no means deteriorates the actual value of the Bible as a book that is vastly conducive to human happiness. What is human happiness made of, but of a few truths and many fictions? In this respect no literature can show anything that might adequately rank with the Bible. Shakespeare's most beautiful monologue on the philosophy of life cannot compare with the depths of Job. Milton's strongest cantos in "Paradise Lost" are far behind some psalms or some chapters of the "Great Unknown"—Isaiah. The simple narrative form of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings and Nehemiah far surpasses Herodotus and Macaulay. The "Song of Songs" is a poetical work of transcendent perfection; "Ecclesiastes" breathes the philosophy of every age and of all time, and "Ruth" surpasses all poems, in prose or verse, ancient or modern. Take, for example, the works of Homer, Virgil, Livy, Tasso, Ariosto, Walter Scott, Tennyson and our own Lew Wallace which present artistic elaboration of a high degree in the descriptions of battles, duels and races; however fine their style, however concise their delineation, they pale by the side of that simple story which tells of the duel between David and Goliath. Dramatic force is exhausted in the life and adventures of Joseph; the exodus of the Hebrews from Egypt; the fall of Jericho, the death scene of Elijah; the song of Deborah; David's lamentations over Saul; the lives and adventures of Jonathan and Absalom, and last but not least, those grand, wondrously penetrating strains, those sobs and heartrending wailings of Jeremiah as he sat upon the ruins of Jerusalem.

There is another, grander, idea in the Jew's love for the Bible, (and by that I mean the learned Jew, for it is he and he alone of all his people, who thinks and reasons intelligently about these subjects) and that is the Moutheistic Doctrine, which runs through the books like a red thread in a blue web. However diversified the subjects, however different the form and style of each book, however long the periods between the composition of the works, one thought permeates the whole—the belief in one ever-living, ever-present, omnipotent Creator and Ruler of the Universe—that very doctrine for which heathen Rome and Greece despised the Hebrew. It is as if some malevolent spirit and not the awakened consciousness of the oneness, the harmony the homogeneity of the universe, had inspired and burdened a people with this doctrine. Begotten in an age of idolatry, this one idea has withstood the onslaughts of human antagonism, has caused its adherents untold agony, and seems to be destined to unite all mankind under the benign influence of its wisdom and rationality. The speeches delivered by the prophets against the oft-occurring weakness of the Jews for worshipping the idols of their neighbors—by the way, a species of national suicide—constitute the chief beauty of the Bible.

The Jews, it is well known, are optimists; they are not so rash nor so ready to destroy themselves or their fellow beings as other people. This optimism has often been remarked upon by those whose imperfect knowledge of the Jews made them the reader to judge. Some called it cowardice; others were pleased to excuse this trait by the insinuation that the Jews counting their shekels, could ill afford time for genteel sport. (How cutting one another's throats could possibly be genteel, or anything worth practicing, ordinary understanding fails to grasp). That the Jew was a fighter, when fighting counted for domestic bliss, patriotism, the love of God and law, history gives incontrovertible testimony. But the Jews, who are said to have rejected Christ, actually lived and acted in the spirit of His teachings. They bore their burdens with meekness, satisfied with God's sunshine, the law, and cemented the union so characteristic of the Jew. Christ preached his sermons from the Old Testament, and the Jews lived their lives, bore their sorrows, buoyed up by the same spirit; hoping for and believing in the golden dawn of a lasting joy. This optimistic inspiration, which endows a Christ with patience and fortitude to bear His cross to Calvary, which gives the Jew courage to suffer twenty centuries of martyrdom, whence is it taken but from the Bible? And though it took a thousand years to accomplish the entire work, this splendid idea was never lost sight of.

It is a pathetic story worth relating how the early fragments of the Bible, those fragments known as the "Five Books," were saved from utter destruction shortly before the devastation of the first temple in Jerusalem (586 B. C.) When the hollow eyes of death stared the Jews in the face, they bethought them of the fragments of the "Five Books" and other manuscripts, which had lain in the "book chamber" forgotten, unread and uncared for. It was a blessed impulse that prompted the man or men—who knows? one man often saves a nation—to remove the manuscripts from their mouldy repository and to secrete them where the ruthless hand of the heathen could not touch them. Who were the men, who moved by a veneration for these old fragments or by an awakened consciousness of their national value, saved them, carried them into Babylonian captivity, and sent them back to the motherland, when the light of redemption illumined the path of their descendants? Who were they? Who knows? Who cares? They are not inglorious. What they have accomplished in moments of dire distress, has shed a waneless glory upon the race. Emulating this heroic example of true devotion to the religio-literary treasures of the nation, the later Jews, the "Men of the Great Synod," edited and enlarged these fragments, creating this wondrous book, the Bible. Thanks to these pioneers in the literary domain of the Jews, the three most rational religions—Judaism, Christianity and Mohammedanism—came into existence. As it is, who can tell how much has been lost? how much poorer we are to-day in humanity, brotherly love and general mental enjoyment? According to the book of Kings, Solomon was the author of three thousand proverbs and one thousand and five songs. Of the former but few are extant, and of the latter we have the "Song of Songs," the idyllic charm of which magnifies our regret for the loss of the others. The Bible is the Jew's patent of cosmic citizenship. By means of this he preached to the world the doctrine of liberty, equality and fraternity. What the world gained in art, in philosophy, aye, even in science, is largely due to the Bible. God-graced poets transplanted Sharon's lilies and Jericho's roses in the gardens of the Occident. Racine, Shakespeare, Byron, Milton, Lessing, Heine, Herder, Klopstock, Goethe and Schiller, all drank at the Biblical fountain; from the winged words of the ancient seers, from the grand yet simple rhythm of their speeches, the great of the latter-day poets borrowed the fine and charming simplicity of their art, hence it may be said with a full degree of justice, that all modern poetry and the sacred in particular is a continuous, perpetuating commentary of the ancient writings. But greater than the poets, more lasting than literature itself is the Jew as a conservator of the Bible, which he read amidst joy and sorrow, domestic opulence or ceaseless, homeless wanderings, treasuring its teachings, adhering to its plain and simple standard of ethical, social and religious principles; and for that the world owes the Jew a debt, it can repay only by a truer appreciation of his character, a better regard for his virtues, and a fuller desire to understand his mission in the world.

THE startling news that the society leader of cotillions and sich, Ed. Greenway, is about to rest on his laurels and "give some other fellow a chance," has produced more than a ripple in the swim. Dowagers have grown so sure of what the genial gentleman directs or advises, they shake their dear old heads in despair at facing future functions without his invaluable aid as to list of guests and list of dishes alike. Then the sweet buds, who have sube reverence for Greenway that he is the one thing they do reverence—"who," say they, "is to tell us which man to dance with, and how to discriminate as to 'favors,' etc." The men take it more philosophically, and one or two, with more money than employment, are going to devote the Lenten period to getting tips from the tired Ed., and to studying deeply the figures of the german. So things might be worse, after all.

A novel scheme to keep one's name before a friend has found its home in the brain of one of our society young ladies. On the occasion of an anniversary or return home of a friend—when flowers have ceased to arrive, our young lady lets a few days pass on, and then she deftly sends on her donation, cleverly figuring out that with the "masse" her little gift is liable to be overlooked. In this way, the welcome home or birthday have been followed by a few intimates, and the floral celebrations begin to last close on to a fortnight.

Gossip says the old hoys of the Cosmos Club are meditating an elaborate Easter housewarming in their new quarters, the defunct Lake school, and their lady friends will surely never let the idea die out for want of fuel. It is also reported that the club will inaugurate a ladies' grill room, where luncheons may be served of so dainty a type that the University Club menu will not be "in it."

The girls are bemoaning the departure of the popular beau, Sam Boardman, for Honolulu, but as he is hooked for the Easter cotillions, his absence will not be a prolonged one. The only fear is that the sea voyage may have "possibilities" in fellow travelers that will catch the young man's fancy, away from the girls he left behind him.

Now that the success of the society play is an assured fact, society may look for more amateur undertakings in the theatrical line. 'Tis said that some excellent material for the drama can be found among the newly arrived Third Artillery at the Presidio, and the young ladies of the regiment are declared to be especially gifted.

Already the swagger set is making up parties for country pastimes, arranging to go together to different locales, as tastes dictate. San Rafael seems to be the chief favorite, so far, to judge by the long list of fashionable people who have written for rooms at the Hotel Rafael to genial host Warfield.

An on dit from the Islands goes that Donald de V. Graham's success in Honolulu has been phenomenal, but that if the breakage of any more vessel's gear necessitates a further stay in that festive spot, our own Donald de V. runs in danger of being kept there altogether.

Society is wondering as to who will be the fortunate one selected to assist Mrs. Claus Spreckels in dispensing the hospitalities of the Van Ness avenue palace. Some say a niece; others, that the eldest son and his amiable wife will be domiciled with the old folks.

Rumor asserts that Mrs. R. P. Schwerine will entertain card club parties during Lent. The guests who played at the party given by Mrs. Hopkins, wife of the oculist, say it was a most delightful affair in every way.

It was decidedly amusing to note the different girls at the Crocker tea—that is, the tea at the Crocker mansion last Saturday. The admiring glances they cast on themselves every time they passed a mirror at seeing themselves doing the honors of the palatial abode! How many a secret sigh and wish for the reality went up from youthful hearts that day!

Mrs. Maria Norris's many friends are delighted to welcome her back from her long visit to Japan, but fear her stay here will only be a temporary one, if gossip speaks by the eard.

"Miss Romie Wallace and Miss Bernie Drown are said to resemble each other greatly, but in height alone can I see it," was the remark of a young clubman at the last Fort-nightly.

If you want to give your Eastern friends a delightful surprise take them into see Geo. T. Marsh & Co., at 625 Market street. All the curios, art and fine tapestry work for which the Japanese are famous, will be found there, and Marsh can tell you all about them.

"Fontenay, the Swordsman." A military novel by Fortune du Boisgobey. Translated by H. L. Williams. Published by Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago and New York.

A Book of the Week. This is a well-told story of the Napoleonic wars in Spain, the chief interest of which centers round a young West Indian named Fontenay, a favorite and protégé of the Empress Josephine. Fontenay is in love with the Empress's reading-woman, Marguerite de Gavre, who has some relatives and a fortune in Spain. The story opens with a dramatic duel between Fontenay and a blustering, bullying military officer named Carénac: the duel is interrupted by the unexpected appearance of the Empress, and the contestants part to renew the quarrel on another occasion. Long afterwards, in Spain, the two officers meet on a battlefield, and agree to march up to the enemy's guns side by side, and let Fate settle the dispute. By strange luck, both the men escape, and become fast friends. Fontenay is accompanied throughout the war by Tournesol, a tall and humorous Gascon, whose unflinching good temper and practical knowledge of soldiership are invaluable to his superior officer. Fontenay has many exciting adventures and hair's-breadth escapes, but, of course, comes safely out of them all and marries his lady-love, who, having lost her Spauish fortune through the machinations of a wicked uncle, is generously dowered by the Empress. The story moves briskly all through, and the translation is satisfactory, except for a tendency on the part of the translator to misuse his "wills" and "shalls," as, for instance: "In a week we will be in Paris;" "I will be charmed to perform my novitiate under your direction;" "It is probable that we will assault the large hospital before long." The worst of these misuses of the signs of the future tense is the following: "We will not be shown mercy; we'll be massacred." This is surpassed only by the famous ejaculations of the Irishman who, having fallen into a river, exclaimed: "I will be drowned, and no one shall help me." Nor do we much like the following sentences: "A soldier must not thank a Marshal of France like a citizen may a State official who grants him a favor;" "He has left orders concerning you at the war ministry's;" "This so quickly interrupted appeal of the bronze annunciator." The last is a pretentiously offensive manner of telling of the sudden cessation of the ringing of a bell. But, notwithstanding these blemishes, the tale is eminently readable, and will prove pleasant to any one fond of lively incident and dangerous adventure, not unmingled with humor and the sentiment of love.

"The Month in Literature, Art and Life: A Journal of Cultivation," is a monthly edition of The Critic, edited by Joseph B. Gilder and Jeannette Gilder, the latter of whom is responsible for the department entitled "The Lounger." The first, or January issue, contained one hundred and six pages of magazine size, filled with interesting literary matter, illustrated by portraits of Rudyard Kipling, Walter Pater, Lord Tennyson, Bishop Creighton of London, Dr. John Maclaren Watson, Dr. Birkbeck Hill, and many other celebrities. From it I learn that Sir Edward John Poynter, the new President of the Royal Academy, is an uncle of Rudyard Kipling, that young Anglo-Indian whom the gods have gifted with the faculty of story-telling in a higher degree than any of his contemporaries, and who goes very near being the greatest poet of his day to boot. The President of the Royal Academy receives $5000 per annum, and Sir Edward receives an additional $5000 as Director of the National Gallery. We are surprised to find "The Lounger" writing "What would we say if," etc.; but then, the very air breathes corruption in the use of "will" and "shall," "would" and "should." Apropos of a statement lately made by The Argonaut to the effect that American writers do not "get a fair show" in American magazines. "The Lounger" points out that Poultney Bigelow, W. D. Howells, Mrs. J. W. Alexander, Laurence Hutton, Brander Matthews, C. D. Warner, J. K. Bangs, and a host of other Americans, are writing as hard as they can for Harper's Magazine, and that American writers figure very largely in The Bazar and The Weekly. The Century, too, is, with the exception of Mrs. Humphry Ward's story, full of the work of American pensters, as are also St. Nicholas and Scribner's? Why should American periodicals har out all hut American writers? Certainly, British periodicals accept good work from whichever side of the Atlantic it comes, without troubling themselves about the nativity of the writer. "The Lounger" places us under obligation by rescuing the following gem from the New York Evening Post: "Wild dogs as dangerous as wolves have lately been abundant in those parts of Japan that were destroyed by the tidal wave of January 15th. They killed several country postmen, until these officials were supplied with trumpets, of which these animals are afraid." Thus in certain parts, now non-existent, of Japan, postmen, though "killed," come to life again, and deliver letters as if nothing had happened, if they are "supplied with trumpets," of which (or the noise produced by blowing upon which?) the dogs are afraid. One would have supposed that the only trumpet that would avail to awaken a dead mail-carrier would be the trump of the Archangel announcing the Day of Judgment. Please observe the "woulds" in the last sentence.

We are sorry to see an esteemed contemporary falling into the error, much beloved of the daily newspapers, of speaking of a recent bride as "Mrs. H. A. Isenberg, nee Virginia Duisenberg." Supposing that "nee" stands for née, surely the present Mrs. Isenberg was not "horn Virginia"; she was horn a naked infant, to whom, after much cudgelling of their brains, the worthy Duisenberg pair (père and mère) gave the name "Virginia." That the error is not accidental is shown by the fact that, on the same page, another young woman is spoken of as "nee Louise."

From the January issue of The Book and News Dealer we learn that many newsdealers have torn out from the copies of Munsey's for sale on their stands all advertising pages containing announcements of subscription-agents offering to supply two or more periodicals at reduced rates. Thus the advertisers whose advertisements are so unlucky as to be printed on the same pages or on the opposite side of those pages, lose the benefit of their advertisements. Here is fresh proof of the fact that people eager to hurt those whom they do not like are quite ready to injure entirely innocent people as well. The Delineator, McClure's, Godey's, and other magazines and their advertisers, have also suffered in the same way as Munsey's. The Book and News Dealer tells us that some periodicals, anxious to increase their circulation at any sacrifice of dignity and self-respect, have adopted the plan of giving subscriptions free to purchasers of a well-known and much-advertised breakfast food. Thus the day is not far distant when people shall buy their hooks from their grocers and get their literature from their hutchers.

New Occasions, defined as "a magazine of social progress," is published by Charles H. Kerr and Company, of Chicago. The January issue opens with a bitter attack on Grover Cleveland, and continues with a description of Chicago, which is branded as "A City Without Shame." William H. Van Ornum contributes an essay entitled "Socialism or Individualism." The rest of the issue is taken up with a story, "to be continued in our next," entitled "News from Nowhere, or an epoch of rest."

In the February issue of The National Magazine (Boston) Mrs. Marion Hill of San Francisco has a short story entitled: "At McNally's Bend: a tale of the Sierras." It is a sketch of a rough rancher who falls hopelessly in love with an educated woman temporarily a guest at his farm, and, though the idea is not elaborated, the sketch is daintily and effectively done.

Merit always wins. This is strikingly shown in the great popularity of J. F. Cutter Whiskey. Go where you may you will find that Cutter stands at the head. It has been tried often, but never found wanting. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, are sole Coast agents for this fine liquor.

The neatest and most pleasing effects in gentlemen's furnishing goods are found at John W. Carmany's 25 Kearny street.

DEAR EDITH: I notice that the latest ball gowns are principally remarkable for their simplicity, but this approach to old days is at once apologized for by the striking combination of colors and the very rich quality of their composition. Of course, there are exceptions to this Paris costume. Take, by way of illustration, the Princess hall gown. It is extremely elegant and distingué; indeed it may be called the essence of good taste and style, but as it can only be made by the skillful fingers of first-rate couturieres, whose prices are too long for moderate dress allowances, it remains the property of the wealthy. Most lovely princess gowns are made of satin in pale colors ornamented with garlands of jewel embroidery and black silk muslin. The bodice of one of these charming robes of pale pink satin has the front draped slightly to avoid breast seams that never look well in satin, and the back is fitted to the figure as far as the waist, where the skirt breadths are sloped out to fall in flowing flutes and give a slight train. The skirts of the simpler gowns claim most of the trimming, and it is put on in more ways than one ever dreamed of. Spanish flounces are popular, and when the material used is of gauzy texture, the effect of a Spanish flounce is wrought by placing the material in tiny plaits at the hips and allowing it to flare about six inches from the waist-hand.

Narrow rose ruches of mousseline de soie or chiffon are used a great deal in trimming the skirts of evening gowns. They are often put on over the seams of a skirt, or they describe all sorts and kinds of scallops around the edge of a skirt.

No dress skirt, however fine in construction or the make, can fit well over a carelessly made underskirt. The grand monde and those who can afford it have long discarded the white starched skirt. The favorite material is now silk—white or colored—and happy the woman whose purse permits of several of these dainty feminine requisites; yet, even to her whose purse is not overflowing, a silk underskirt or two need not be beyond reach, if an exact and artistic eye guide the hand which understands wielding the needle. Almost every woman who attends social functions at all, needs an especial underskirt to add to the stylish appearance of her evening gown. A new model and one that is very practicable and easily imitated is of white taffeta of a good and rather stiff quality. The skirt has five gores with two darts in the front gore, and one in each side gore, adjusting it snugly to the figure. It is unlined, but has at the bottom a facing twelve inches in width of white satin, interlined with a narrow strip of white linen canvas. The back breadths are gathered in the belt, and have, thirteen inches down from the waist line on the inside of the skirt, a strip of silk sewn horizontally across, into which is inserted a reed or pliable steel thirteen inches long, a white elastic holding the ends together and hending the reed into a semi-circle. This lends to the dress skirt a particularly pleasing flare, beside holding up and easing the weight of the garment. Three silk ruffles of graduated widths, the narrowest above, the widest below, are trimmed with rows of narrow white satin ribbon and edged with white lace. At the back of the underskirt, which is two inches shorter than the dress skirt, is huttoned on a gathered and gored breadth of white silk three-quarters of a yard wide at the top, and two yards wide at the bottom, falling over the reed, and forming a short round train trimmed with rows of ruffles. This extra hack breadth is detachable, and can be huttoned to the underskirt when it is worn with the short trained evening skirt again to be in vogue.

A black satin or changeable taffeta skirt can be similarly made for street wear, the trained breadth then being omitted and the ruffles corded and tucked instead of lace edged.

Business has been duller than ever on Pine street, and the Micawbers of the Comstock Shares. Exchange are still waiting for somebody to turn up and make the business prosperous for them again. It never seems to strike any of them that it would be a good idea to try and shake matters up a little themselves and be independent. Harvesting the new crop of tenderfoot investors does not pay now that cultivation has died out since a head to the business has been lost. It is becoming more apparent daily that if self preservation counts for anything the few progressive men in the hoard will have to break away from the Old Men of the Sea with whom they are now associated and form the nucleus of another Exchange which can offer attractions to speculators. Even granted that a new discovery is made in the Comstock, what does it amount to unless it can be taken advantage of on the floor instead of letting it fall flat through bad management. There have been several good opportunities spoiled of late to make a market by the inordinate haste of every man in the business, to clean up a few dollars on the first advance. A hungrier crew never existed than this Pine street outfit. A few cents profit in a stock is a sign for a general scramble, in which the speculative broker mixes it with the client of the commission man. The manipulator who is working to make his line of stocks attractive, soon gets sick of the game when he finds himself pitted against sellers who tumble in fifty shares on him for every one purchased. This is at the bottom of the trouble in the market, and with a good development in hand, any one going in to handle a stock must be prepared to stand off the poverty stricken mob before he could possibly expect to reach the old time outside dealers who have retired from the street in disgust. The mines are in good shape for a renewal of active trading, if only a leader could be found for the market. The necessity for a new levy of assessments has served to lower prices for the week, but the break in many cases has been heavy enough to warrant the expectation of a reaction.

An attempt has been made by some modern reformer in Utah to have a law passed similar to the one engineered through our own Legislature some years ago, compelling every corporation, by its President and Secretary, to file for the inspection of all stockholders on the first Monday of each month a sworn statement of every item of receipt and expenditure, and also a sworn statement from the Superintendent of every detail of all work in the mine, size of ore bodies, amount of ore extracted, men employed, as well as all new discoveries. Another clause of the bill provides that the owners of even a single share in a mine has the right to take an expert with him and make a full and complete examination of the mine, the Superintendent to afford him every aid at the same time. The bill is being fought tooth and nail by the mining companies, who claim that its provisions are of absolutely no value if complied with, and are an unlawful and unwarranted interference in private business. Shareholders have all these rights in this State, but they have never borne very heavily on the officials outside of an occasional attempt to collect the $1,000 penalty from a Secretary and President now and then for some alleged technical breach of the law, which has never yet proved successful. To check the natural inclination of some people to reach out for money on every opening of the kind, the present Legislature of this State has knocked out the penal clause in the law by providing the stockholder with other equitable relief, harring the class alone with "itching palms." The cases where shareholders will go to the expense of experting a mine are few and far between.

It is gratifying to learn that the Thistle Mining Company of Plumas County expects to start up again within a few days. This can be accepted as satisfactory evidence that the property has not been so badly damaged by the flood of water as was at first anticipated.

A report was current (during the week The Movement that the Utica had been sold, and the In Gold Mines. absurdly high figure of $15,000,000 has been quoted as the price paid. This in itself would be enough to stamp the story a canard, independent of the denial made by the owners or their representatives. Sales in California have not been nearly so numerous as people might suppose from the stories published from time to time. Nearly all the big mines have had their inning with this expert or the other, but the owners still have their property on hand awaiting the advent of some ignoramus with more money than brains. These experts do not apparently look through glasses of the same magnifying powers as the owners do, and their cuts in values have been mild when not exceeding one-half of the asking price. Within the week a one million dollar prospect was inspected by an expert, who finally reported that if the owners would knock off $700,000 from their price, he might recommend the mine for still further investigation. They tumbled there and then. The owners of another million and a half layout are gradually recovering from a shock to their feelings, caused by the report of an expert, which awakened them to the fact that their figures were nearly a million too high, while another Nevada County crowd are still in the sulks over an eye-opener of a similar character. This is what comes from extravagant statements and inflated ideas, which have been carried, in many cases to which we could point, beyond the bounds of absurdity. So far, the danger to foreign investors has been reduced to a minimum by the action of the mine proprietor, who has put himself very effectually out of any position to do harm by a display of overweening greed and mendacity, which has only served to make him ridiculous outside of his own particular clique of admirers and sympathizers.

Unless some concessions are made on both sides, the big De La Mar mine of Nevada will be closed down for some time to come, notwithstanding the large monthly yield in bullion. The fact that the camp had been developed from a few tumble-down cabins to its present importance, and was growing in importance, sufficed to bring the labor agitator, accompanied by the usual train of evils. A Miners' Union has been formed, and all the machinery put in place to create trouble between the employers and the employed. It is the same old story of Leadville and many another promising Western mining camp. At the De La Mar the men have been getting $3 per day; they are well treated, and up to date have formed a contented and progressive community. Now, since the seed of discord has been sown by one of these so-called labor organizers, a strike is talked of, and the mine manager in disgust has announced his intention of shutting down work at the mine and mill for an indefinite period. Mr. De La Mar has already issued orders to this effect, and proposes to run his mines independent of outside dictation. Either the agitator leaves the camp or he will; that is the dictum, and from all that can be learned, the employer in this case has right on his side. The men have been well treated in every respect, and paid higher wages than they could get anywhere else outside of the Comstock, where the managers are forced to pay $4. But that is no criterion to go by, for sundry reasons, which could be given in explanation. Candelaria is a fair example, on the other hand, of what the labor agitator can do in the way of closing down mines and depopulating a mining district.

The report of the Directors of this bank for the half year ended December 31, 1896, submitted to the general meeting held at Cannon-street Hotel on February 17th, states that after paying all charges and deducting rebate of interest on bills not due, the balance at the credit of profit and loss account was £14,922, which they propose to appropriate as follows, namely: £12,000 in payment of a dividend at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum free of income tax, leaving £2,922 to be carried forward. During the past half-year they have closed the branches at Seattle and Tacoma, State of Washington, but new branches have been opened at Sandon and Kaslo, in the Kootenay district of British Columbia.

Downfall

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou!"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

A BEARDED goat from Bernal Heights,
With human sadness in his eye,
Strayed to the City Hospital,
And, groaning, laid him down to die.
So strange the symptoms he displayed,
That in the interest of science
The surgeons present kindly made
A brief post-mortem. No appliance,
Said they, on searching with the knife,
Could e'er have saved poor Billy's life.
No wonder that the quadruped,
His frightful struggles o'er, lay dead—
They found in his interior
A Sabbath-day Examiner.

THE number of deaths that occurred in this city last Monday was away and above the usual proportion, and has elicited universal comment. It is more than probable that Mr. Bierce's "Prattle" in that day's issue of our refined family journal, the Examiner, had something to do with these extra demises. Mr. Bierce has so long considered himself on a par with the Deity, and has therefore confined his exuberant utterance to the Sabbath, that when he delivered himself of himself on a weekday the shock proved too much for his readers. Too much of Mr. Bierce is as fatal as sewer gas.

ONE thousand dollars' worth of "hellos" have monthly been sent echoing adown the corridors of time by the city of San Francisco. Supervisor Rottanzi, rising to the occasion on a high wave of economy, has secured a reduction of rates amounting to two thousand dollars per year. So far so good, but will that two thousand revert to the city treasury, or will a new office be created to consume it? THE TOWN CRIER himself would be satisfied with that modest sum annually, as Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to the Farallones.

PRATE not to me of Paradise
And all its boasted bliss;
No doubt the other world is nice;
It can't, though, equal this.
For what to me its fond delights
When on the golden streets,
No placards tell of sloggers' fights
And what each hero eats.
Why drag me up the golden stair
With Corbett nor Fitzsimmons there?

SOME malicious person has set afloat the rumor that ex-Mayor Sutro, whose desires to enter society's giddy whirl have caused his friends considerable uneasiness since his retirement from office, appeared at the bal masque Tuesday night disguised as a wolf in sheep's clothing. The statement is absurd on the face of it. To begin with, the ex-Mayor has no friends, and, secondly, there is not a hand-me-down shop in town that keeps sheep's clothing in stock. Adolph's alibi is easily proven.

AN innocent infant, who was interviewed the other day by a representative of the Mission-street news scavenger, asked if the Examiner was a "school." The reporter was struck dumb with amazement at such an evidence of juvenile depravity, and so could not answer the question. Such an easy one, too! Yes, my child, it is a school—for scandal.

THE lesson taught by the demise of Mr. Quackenbush of Oakland is that aged millionaires may ward off the attacks of designing boardinghouse keepers, but that they are not in it when it comes to a tussle with Death. And yet, there are those who will not deny that the aged capitalist chose wisely between marriage and the grim monster.

THE baseball fiend doth break his arm,
Which crippleth his right paw;
The pugilist is free from harm—
He worketh with his jaw.

THE Chinese vegetable growers are wishing that St. David's Day came every month. It would materially help the sale of leeks.

THIRTY families of Gypsies have been unloaded on Berkeley by this inconsiderate municipality. San Francisco, having more beggars than she knows what to do with, in desperation has diverted the overflow into the University town. Well, at all events, it won't disturb Berkeley's peace half as much to have a flock of unwashed seers turned loose in her Elysian fields as it does our civic serenity when a band of her college desperadoes bring themselves and their ungodly yell over here. We must even up things, somehow.

THE CRIER notes without surprise that a diamond pin was deftly absorbed from a saloon-keeper's shirt front by a pick-pocket in Judge Joachimsen's Court on Saturday last, and that a lady was relieved of her purse in the same manner while she was in Judge Campbell's courtroom; for these are not the first instances wherein Justice has been dispensed with in the precincts of the blind goddess about the City Hall.

"STEPS will now be taken to have work commenced on the new Postoffice building."—Morning paper.

Such statements beguile
But they do not deceive me.
With skeptical smile
I ponder the while
On its structural style,
For the joke does not grieve me—
Such statements beguile
But they do not deceive me.

THE discovery of an inexpensive substitute for india-rubber by a Santa Rosa newspaper man, will not be hailed with delight by any save the keepers of fashionable boarding-houses. The india-rubber duck, like the india-rubber steak and the gutta-percha chop, reduces the profits in this unholy business to a very small margin. With this inexpensive substitute, on the other hand, it will prove fairly lucrative again. We are horn to sorrow, anyway.

THE Socialists are at it again. They have commenced a three-months' course of lectures, to which the dear public is cordially invited free of charge. One of the shining lights of the rostrum is to speak on "The World as I Would Have it." Evidently our be-whiskered and pop-eyed brethren of Socialistic faith are as covetous as the rest of us. They, too, want the earth.

SEEING that the Legislature increased the wages of officials of the San Francisco Fire Department, an investigation into the mystery of Martin Kelly and that fire-engine would not have been amiss. The matter is now looked upon as ancient history, but for the sake of future students it should be properly sifted.

THE ghost of Quackenbush, I fancy,
Will never hover o'er his Nancy.
You see, her claim to be his wife,
In such hot water steeped his life
That even should he flee below,
(Where millionaires are apt to go),
The chances are that he would say,
On bidding hades' host good-day,
"Just keep that door shut, Satan, please—
This place is cold enough to freeze!"

A PATHETIC picture appeared in the Call a few days ago, showing Mr. Cleveland and his family packing their solitary trunk and preparing to "go West." If things are really as had as the artist depicts, let us start a contribution and forward the proceeds to our late President.

THE seven internes at the City and County Hospital, who removed the mustache and a part of the upper lip of their fellow student Blum, have been given a month's vacation. Had the hazers taken off his head it is probable that they would have been given a whole year's freedom.

THE procuring of pure food for the city is, of course, highly commendable, but it only solves half the problem that vexes inner humanity. For what doth it avail us to have good food in a city full of had cooks?

THE TOWN CRIER respectfully suggests that the young man who was married while under arrest for burglary be granted his liberty. Matrimony is sufficient expiation for any past offense.

PRAISE be to God that they are over—
Those eight unlucky years with Grover.

"NO, I can never marry a man who smokes. The smell is so horrid, and, besides, I must be the first in my husband's affections. I must have no rivals in the shape of dirty old pipes and ragged tobacco pouches."

"You shall have no rivals, Miss Fortescue. You can have none. You are more perfect than any pipe. Not even the little one I bought last year is for a moment to be compared —"

"No, I suppose not," she broke in, laughing mischievously, "at least you say so now. But old sweethearts are dangerous, and men have returned to their old loves before now," and the blue eyes glanced merrily, and the little feet tapped the floor.

I grew desperate. "I will sacrifice anything you wish. I will indeed. I will never smoke again. I will burn everything."

"Even the little pipe you bought last year?" she said with a provoking smile. I could have kissed or killed her at that moment.

"Even the little pipe I bought last year," I echoed sadly, and I think there must have been a tear in my eye. "I will place myself beyond the reach of all temptation. And then?"

"Then we will begin to think about it," she retorted, jumping up, and moving towards the door.

"Think about it?" I said. "Do you realize what I am going to sacrifice? Can you promise no more?"

"I am afraid not. You see I must prove you first. The spirit is often willing, but the flesh is weak."

"I will be strong," I cried, "and I may hope?"

"All men may hope. But you will be well watched, and one cigarette will shatter all your hopes. The house will now adjourn until the end of March, when we will reopen the debate. Good-bye. Don't forget the little pipe," and she danced out of the room, turning round at the door to give me a mocking little bow, and a smile that left me a raving lunatic.

Slowly and sadly I went home, and climbed up the stairs to my sanctum. I sat down in a comfortable chair and thought. There was a pipe on the table by my side; it was the little one she was jealous of. The firelight fell on its glowing bowl, and I believe it winked at me. I took it up tenderly and stroked it. My eye wandered to the tobacco jar. I reached out my hand and took the lid off. I filled the pipe, looking like a guilty being. Then I went to the door and locked it, and drew the curtains close over every window. I took a match and struck it, but I hesitated and the match burnt my fingers and fell on the floor. I lit another, but again the voice of conscience whispered to me, and again I burnt my fingers. Then I swore loudly and hurled the pipe into a corner and sent the match box and tobacco jar after it.

My heart swelled with pride. I had conquered. A vast range of possibilities opened up before me. What might I not do in the future with such a will of iron. I grew reckless, and began to revel in my new strength. I rose and took a newspaper which I spread out on the table. Then I laid a box of cigars on it, and two boxes of cigarettes, on the top of these one or two cigarette holders, and a dozen pipes of different sorts and sizes. After that I fetched the pipe from the corner and laid it reverently on the summit of the heap, "a sorrow's crown of sorrow;" over them all I softly poured the fragrant tobacco from my jar, and began to collect my pouches. "They will smell —" I murmured to myself, "but the sacrifice must be made complete."

Then I unlocked the door, and drew back all the curtains, and pulled up all the blinds. I was not going to hide my light under a bushel. I put myself in the direction of the fireplace, laid hold of the paper by its four corners and shut my eyes. In a minute all would be over. I moved towards the fireplace, but as I did so a thought struck me, and I hesitated. "Am I doing right? It will be a sinful waste. I will give all away to the poor. And then ought I not keep some of the things? That pouch my aunt worked for me? That pipe my brother gave me? The presents from various members of the family? No, it would hardly be quite right." I hesitated, and was lost.

There came a knock at the door, and Willoughby entered.

Willoughby is a great friend of mine—so far as any non-smoker can be a smoker's friend. I would not let him be a witness of my defeat. I put the newspaper and its contents hastily down on the table.

"What on earth are you doing, Johnson?" he cried.

"Oh, I just—just clearing up," I said with an attempt at a smile. "The room gets in such an awful muddle you know."

"Your tobacco looks as if you kept it on the floor," he said, flinging himself into a chair. "But I have something to talk to you about. We have always been great friends, but hitherto there has been one bar to the perfect communion of our souls. You smoke; I do not. At last that bar is going to be removed."

A cold sweat gathered on my forehead. He had guessed my intentions, or had Lil told him. She could not have been so mean as to publicly crow over her conquest. I fecbly answered "Yes," with a mixture of assent and interrogation in my tone.

"Yes, old man," he said, rising and grasping my hand, "there is now nothing between us. I am going to— to smoke."

I looked at him in silent astonishment.

"Yes, old man, smoke. Why do you look so concerned? It is not very bad, is it? I mean, the beginning?" I saw his enthusiasm die away as the reality rose before him.

"Oh, no," I replied in a tone that suggested a few survivors of the ordeal.

"You don't seem very glad," he said. "But I am going to let you teach me. What shall I start on? Quick, tell me. My courage is screwed up to the point. I can't wait a moment."

The fiend of malice entered my soul. If I was to suffer by seeing him smoke, and knowing that I must deny myself even a cigarette, he should suffer too. I have some peculiarly rank cigars that I keep for my enemies. I gave him one.

He lit it, and pulled at it vigorously, talking the while to keep his courage up. "Why don't you smoke, old man?" he said, jovially. "I thought you could never resist the smell. Come, light up."

"I am going to give it up for a time. Lent, you know. Must give up something. Doctor's orders, too. Bad for the heart. Waste of money. Think of so many poor people who want for bread."

"What?" he cried, and he began to jeer at my infidelity. I cursed him under my breath, but as he grew paler, and ceased to chatter, I felt I was revenged, and even began to pity him.

At last he let the cigar out, and grew very thoughtful. I poured him out something to drink, and we both imbibed steadily for two hours, I to drown my sorrow and regret, he to keep himself alive.

Then we both grew more cheery and communicative. He told me he thought he would never repeat such an experience, but did not see how to avoid it. Fact was, he said, he had promised some one—had promised a lady—to smoke. She had said she would not marry a man unless he smoked. Besides, smoking destroyed germs.

Confidence begets confidence, and I told him my story with tears in my eyes. "I cannot do it," I cried. "I don't think I can, either," he moaned. "But I must, or she will not marry me. How I wish we could exchange. You are in luck. What an excellent wife yours will make you. So considerate of your health, so thoughtful for the poor."

"You are in luck, indeed. She must be a sweet girl. So sensible. She's quite right about germs. Exchange is no robbery. Let's exchange. We will introduce each other. The rest will be only a question of time."

"It's a bargain!"

"I have perfect faith in your taste, but who is she?"

"I think you have met her: Lillian Fortescue. What on earth's the matter?" I had sworn a loud oath at the mention of the name, and crushed a cigarette box to pieces with my fist.

"What's the matter?" I cried. "Why, you fool, there's no need for any exchange. We have both been fooled by the same girl."

For a few minutes neither of us spoke, but Willoughby hurled a fresh cigar I had given him into the grate, and my hand slowly stole towards the little pipe I bought last year. It was still filled. I lit it, and after a few puffs, burst into laughter.

"Little devil!" I cried. She said the smell was so horrid, and she would have no rival in a dirty old pipe."

"She said it was so good for a man," he continued, "kept him quiet and out of mischief, and always made him sociable."

"I suppose she wanted neither of us and set us impossible tasks to win her."

"Next morning we concocted the following note, and sent it round to her:

"DEAR MISS FORTESCUE:—We, the undersigned, finding it impossible to fulfill the tasks you have set us, have agreed to undertake one another's burdens, and so accomplish all that you desire.

Your obedient slaves

JOHN WILLOUGHBY,
WILLIAM JOHNSON."

UNGUARDED GATES.—THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.

THE first world-sound that fell upon my ear
 Was that of the great winds along the coast,
 Crushing the deep sea beryl on the rocks—
 The distant breakers' sullen cannonade.
 Against the spires and gables of the town
 The white fog drifted, catching here and there
 At over-leaning cornice or peaked roof,
 And hung—weird gonfalons. The garden walks
 Were choked with leaves, and on their regged biers
 Lay dead the sweets of summer—damask rose,
 Clove-pink, old-fashioned, loved New England flowers.
 Only keen ealt odors filled the air.
 Sea-sounds, sea-odors—these were all my world.
 Hence is it that life languishes with me
 Inland; the valleys stifle me with gloom
 And pent-up prospect; in their narrow bonnd
 Imagination flutters futile wings.
 Vainly I seek the sloping pearl-white sand
 And the mirage's phantom citadelle
 Miraculoue, a moment seen, then gone.
 Among the monntains I am ill at ease,
 Missing the stretched horizon's level line
 And the illimitable restless blue.
 The crag-torn sky is not the sky I love,
 But one nnbroken sapphire spanning all;
 And nobler than the branches of a pine
 Aslant upon the precipice's edge
 Are the strained spars of some great battleship
 Flowing across the eunset. No bird's lilt
 So takes me as the whistling of the gale
 Among the shrouds. My cradle song was this,
 Strange inarticulate sorrows of the sea,
 Blythe rhythms nngathered from the Sirens' caves.
 Perchance of earthly voices the last voice
 That shall an instant my freed spirit stay
 On this world's verge, will be some message blown
 Over the dim salt lands that fringe the coast,
 At dusk, or when the tranced midnight droops
 With weight of stars, or haply jnst as dawn,
 Illumining the sullen purple wave,
 Turns the gray pools and willow stems to gold.

THE VIOLETS.—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

At first I kissed the violets
 Because they came from thee,
 And, then, because no storm-wind frets
 Where they were plucked for me;
 But in a garden green and fair,
 Beyond the bitter snow,
 Where nightingales at eve repair,
 To music they did grow.
 But, though they breathe of sun and song,
 And rivulets that dance
 A-down enchanted slopes, where throng
 Sweet ghosts of old romance;
 Though fragrant with such dew as wets
 The dales of Arcady,
 At first I kissed the violets
 Because they came from thee.

PEACE.—EDITH M. THOMAS, IN SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

Much I did desire when Youth did fire my veins,
 To join fair combat with some foe august;
 And more I dreaded sloth and creeping rust
 Than any need of martyr scorns and pains.
 How would my heart beat quick at clarion strains;
 All to the God of battle would I trust—
 As one who, midst the hissing barbs and dust,
 From some swift Argive chariot flung the reine!
 But now my pulse is slowed, my veins are cold,
 O Spirit of the leafage silver-green—
 Now let thy cool sweet shadow intervene,
 That I no more the strenuous day behold;
 So fold me, as the flocks that rest in fold,
 While Hesper makes the darkening sky serene.

INSURANCE.

It has come to the notice of Insurance Commissioner Higgins that the securities of a number of the assessment companies, deposited to protect policy holders, are not bankable collateral, and it is likely that there will be a sharp and early demand upon the delinquents for further deposits to make good their yawning deficits.

Governor Budd has appointed Attorney Andrew J. Clunie Commissioner of Insurance, the appointment to take effect two years hence, or when Higgins' term is out. Strangely enough the Governor, by this appointment of Clunie, admits that the present Commissioner's appointment was regular. It will be remembered that Governor Budd attempted to oust Commissioner Higgins, who was appointed by Markham in precisely the same manner as he has chosen Clunie, and which act he has held did not conform to law.

President John A. McCall, of the New York Life, is now on his way to the Coast, and is calling on the company's important agencies en route. Mr. McCall will make his first stop out here at Los Angeles, and may be expected to visit San Francisco about the first of April. This will be his first visit to California. McCall is one of the most prominent men in the field of insurance to-day, and may be called a national character.

Last week it was intimated that possibly the Orient might find other quarters than those now occupied by it in the Sun Office. There is, however, no intimation of any change in the management of the Orient. It will continue to dwell in harmony with the Sun under the satisfactory eye of Manager Callingham.

There are nine bills affecting insurance, more or less, before the Legislature. The two most important are that compelling foreign companies to make a deposit of $200,000 in some State before doing business, and that one providing for a standard form for fire policies. Both these bills will become laws.

P. B. Armstrong, at present a prominent orchardist of this State, and the man who founded the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of New York, is now in that city promoting the organization of another fire company. He recently attempted to secure the presidency of the Mutual Fire, but failed.

The current issue of the Adjuster, published by James A. Carey, is a paper of exceptional interest to insurance everywhere. In matter and make-up the Adjuster is easily in the front rank. It is one of the few first-rate insurance journals in the United States.

The Sun Life Insurance Company of Canada has entered the United States for business by way of Pennsylvania. It is the only British company writing life policies in this country.

The State law requiring $5,000 deposit with the Insurance Department by all assessment companies, for the protection of the policy holders, has been evaded by the Pacific States Life Insurance Company, and a sick benefit concern operated by L. M. McKenney. The securities offered by these companies consisted of a local realty syndicate which have no marketable quotation.

J. D. SULLIVAN,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW
Rooms 34-38, 3d Floor Chronicle Building, San Francisco.

ONE of the redeeming features of the Board of Regents of the University of California is J. B. Reinstein, the sharp little attorney, whose brain is in inverse ratio to his inches, and whose wit often causes Horace Platt to look to his laurels. He redeems the board from much dullness, and has been quite successful in his endeavors to keep some of its somnolent members awake. He is intolerant of stupidity, and one of his favorite sayings is that he can stand any animal except a boar. Reinstein's work this winter for the development of the University brought him into close contact with the legislators, who have taxed the State an extra cent for the benefit of Berkeley's aggregation of colleges, and among other eminent statesmen he met Assemblyman Howard Wright, the former business associate of Le Roy Harvey, and who serves his country by representing Lorin at Sacramento. Mr. Wright is an ardent and enthusiastic admirer of Mr. Wright. At the jubilate legis of the friends of the University on the campus last Saturday, young Wright delivered an oration highly eulogistic of himself. His frequent repetition of "I," "I," "I" became exceedingly wearisome to all his auditors, and was absolutely intolerable to Reinstein.

"Too bad about Wright," said the little Regent sympathetically. "Anyone who has so much trouble with his I's should consult an oculist."

When, in referring to Frank Powers, someone asked Judge Coffey if he were not a lawyer, that satirical jurist corrected his questioner with quiet emphasis.

"I hardly think that Powers is a lawyer," said Coffey, doubtfully. "But," he added, "I believe he calls himself an attorney."

In addition to his legal efforts Frank tried politics but, after much labor he only attained the modest dignity of an Assemblyman. He also essayed literature, and once wrote a book which, however, nobody read. Fame having eluded him when pursued along all these different paths, he now cultivates art, haunts the studios, wears his hair long and regardless of the season, in heat and cold, always appears in a long overcoat with an immense collar turned up over his ears. At noon on a warm and bright day recently he walked along Montgomery street thus arrayed, glorying in his unique costume.

"What's the matter, Frank?" asked Garrett McInerney. "Got a chill?"

"No, and I don't want a drink nor some warmer clothes and you can't ring in any guy about my needing a 'brief.'"

"But why do you want to be the only man in town on this warm day, wearing such a horse blanket over your head?" expostulated the attorney.

"Copyrighted," replied Powers, laconically.

The lights of Bohemia burst forth at the Mardi Gras ball on Tuesday night in all the effulgence of their glory, but so much splendor was not attained without much thought and planning. For the preceding week the Social Hall of the Bohemian Club looked like the room of a fashionable costumer, and every topic of other than fancy dress was strictly tabooed. Stalwart Amadee Joullin with his seventy-three inches and his two hundred pounds of avoirdupois had revealed to a group of his friends the details of the raiment with which he intended to dazzle the other guests at the ball. Louis Sloss Jr. sat silently smoking a cigarette at the outer edge of the group.

"Why are you looking so disconsolate, Louis?" asked Jimmie Hamilton. "Are you not going to the Mardi Gras?"

"No, I'm not going," said the wit of Bohemia, sadly, "but my clothes are. You see," he added, in response to a chorus of demands for an explanation, "Amadee is going to wear my frilled shirt and satin waistcoat."

And the point of the joke is that Louis is exactly ten inches shorter than the strapping Amadee.

"No one has more friends on 'the street,' by which, of course is meant California below Montgomery, than Joshua Eppinger, the bright young grain merchant, whose marriage at the Concordia Club to Miss Hilda Levy was one of the fashionable events of the week. He is spending his honeymoon at Coronado, and while en route to Southern California on the Los Angeles train, he went into the smoking compartment of the Pullman, where he encountered an old acquaintance who resides in Portland, Or. The latter hailed Eppinger, and soon showed by his conversation that he was unaware that he was addressing a bridegroom.

"Travelling alone?" asked the Oregonian.

"No, my wife is in the drawing-room," responded Eppinger with imperturbable gravity, determined, after the custom of newly married men, not to give himself a way.

"Do you often take your wife on business trips?" pursued the Portland man. "I never do."

"Oh, well, you know," said Joshua easily. "I often combine business with pleasure when I go out of town," resolved to conceal the honeymoon part of it at all hazards.

"That's all very well if you have no family. Got any children?" demanded the Webfoot.

"No," replied the husband of eighteen hours, without turning a hair. "Have you?"

Charles Webb Howard does not like to be caught napping and for that very reason his intimate friends lie in wait for him with every conceivable trap. In the Pacific Union club last Monday, a little coterie was discussing the movements of President McKinley who that evening had started for the capitol.

"I am sorry for McKinley," said General Barnes, in tones of infinite pity. "He will never see Washington."

Mr. Howard looked startled. His first thought was that "the Major had had another attack of la grippe." Then he looked at Barnes apprehensively, as if he thought that the Chauncey Depew of the Pacific Coast had concocted a plot to blow up the Presidential train with dynamite.

"Why will he never see Washington?" finally asked the President of the Spring Valley Water Company, in an awed voice, forgetting his usual suspicion of the General.

"Washington is dead," replied Barnes, in affected surprise at his friend's ignorance of an historical fact.

And then Charles Webb Howard signed a card for a magnum.

A perceptible decrease in the general gaiety on 'Change has been remarked since the departure for Paris a fortnight ago of William Berg, "the German Traveller." Berg is the greatest practical joker on the floor and contrary to the usual peculiarity of those who make merry at the expense of others, he laughs as heartily when the point is turned against him as when some other man is the butt. As Monday last was a holiday in France, no quotations from the Bourse were received on that day by the San Francisco Produce Exchange. Noting their absence from their usual place among the bulletins of the Call Board, there was much speculation among the bulls and bears as to the cause. No one was able to advance any good reason why business should be suspended throughout the French Republic until Billy Behr solved the problem and wrote his "official" explanation on the bulletin board, as follows:

"The Bourse is closed to-day on account of the arrival in Paris of William Berg, the German traveller."

An odd fad is that cultivated by Attorney Donahue who always carries two watches. One, although encased in inexpensive nickel, is a time-keeper of marvelous accuracy, its owner boasting that it does not vary a second a week from the sun. The other watch is a handsome gold affair, but it is never right, straying away from ten minutes to three hours from the correct time. When asked to explain why he carries two timepieces of such contradictory tendencies, Donahue always has an innocent explanation ready.

"One watch is to tell what time it is, you know," he says, "and the other what time it isn't."

Herman Oelrichs arrived unexpectedly from New York on Tuesday to attend to some vexatious litigation in connection with the estate of his father-in-law, the late Senator Fair. Early on Wednesday morning found Oelrichs among the stalls of the California market, selecting fruit and vegetables, meat and game, for the table of the Pine street mansion, for Herman is an epicure and personally chooses his edibles as well as his wines. After making a poultry purchase, he was particularly disappointed at learning he could procure no wild ducks, the season being closed. Then he expatiated to the proprietor of the stall on the superiority of California game over that to be had in New York, although he mentioned that canvasbacks in Gotham cost six dollars and mallards four.

"Well, them is Fair prices," commented the poulterer, with a grin.

He had recognized his customer.

Several batches of husky rope pullers and Police Judge Campbell with the wouderful capillary growth on his chin, as their referee, constituted a double attraction during the tug of war tournament that was simply irresistible. The criminal jurist did not make even the shadow of a pretense at impartiality but espoused the cause of the Irish team with heartiness and avidity. He evinced great perturbation when he thought they might be worsted.

"Why I can get more pull at the City Hall in five minutes than I can find here in an hour," remarked the friend of "de push," disgustedly, as he witnessed the Irish team lose two cleats.

Then he proceeded to announce in heraldic tones the honors and emoluments which would be bestowed upon the winning team.

"And what do we get if we lose?" inquired one of the Hibernian patriots.

"Sixty days," roared the Police Court autocrat.

To appropriate as souvenirs small bits of bric-a-brac and articles of silverware while a guest at a house is a cheerful habit which is becoming so unpleasantly prevalent in this city that a hostess now has to use her eyes as diligently as it was formerly considered incumbent to extend a listening ear whenever any guest made a remark. A young woman prominently connected through her father with the San Francisco Police Department was at dinner one night and after using a dainty silver spoon of unique design, carefully cleansed it and calmly carried it off, graciously remarking that it would be a welcome and valuable addition to her souvenir collection. All efforts of the hostess to guard her property being futile, and requests for its restoration being pleasantly ignored, she was obliged to invoke the aid of her husband who, after repeated efforts stole the spoon back again. Now the acquisitive young woman wonders why she is so obviously persona non grata at the home of her former friend.

TO-MORROW night, in the Madison Square Assembly rooms, will take place the event for which society has been preparing itself ever since the Bradley-Martin ball—the great tableaux vivants. You may fancy what they will be when M. M. Chartran and Madrayo are to pose the characters and attend to the manipulation of the lights. They themselves will pose in the last tableau, "Cing Mars," M. Chartran as Richelieu. The tableaux will be after paintings by David Neal Compte, Percy Moran, and other distinguished artists.

The ball reminds me of Mrs. Charles Alexander, who was regally magnificent there as a Venetian lady, and that once more reminds me that General McCook, newly appointed to the Cabinet, is that lady's brother-in-law. This will mean, I suppose, that the Alexanders will spend much time in Washington.

Mrs. Edward Foulkes, the daughter-in-law of Doctor Foulkes of Oakland, gave a large luncheon on Tuesday. Her husband appeared during the afternoon with one or two of his club friends, and I have yet to see the ladies' luncheon where the advent of man was not welcome.

Mrs. Wright, the daughter of G. Frank Smith, the lawyer who identified himself and his fortunes with the celebrated Colton case, has been here for a few days. She lives in one of the most attractive houses in Rittenhouse Square, which is the "Mayfair" of Philadelphia, and is one of the leaders in Philadelphia society among the young matrons.

Mrs. George Harding was expected here this week, but was unable to leave home.

Mrs. Harry Gillig will sail in a few days for the other side for a three months' absence, returning in time to open her lovely country house at Larchmont—La Hacienda. She will go to Nice, Cannes, Paris, and to London, for the season. Mrs. Gillig has been confined to the house for several days with violent neuralgia. Her little daughter Gladys has been visiting her for a week.

The romantic episode of the re-marriage of Charley Bandoine and his wife (formerly Mrs. Casper Warrington Whitney) has been the theme of conversation to-day. Mr. Whitney was an old St. Matthew's boy, at San Mateo, and distinguished himself early in life as an adept in athletic sports. He became the editor of the little sporting paper owned, I believe, by James Waterbury of cordage fame, a few years ago, and made a success of it. He later undertook the management of the Sports column in Harper's Weekly, and going abroad wrote a clever set of magazine articles about sports in England. His latest exploit, a journey on snow shoes to the Barren Lands within the Arctic Circle, shows him possessed of wonderful courage and endurance. His wife, the present Mrs. Bandoine, is very beautiful. She divorced him in Oklahoma two years ago or thereabouts. Bandoine's wife secured a divorce from him a few weeks earlier. She was Miss Ruyter, daughter of a former President of the New York Central Railway. Six months after these conjugal ruptures, Mr. Bandoine and Mrs. Whitney drove to Hoboken on the former's coach and were married. The lovely bride occupied the box seat, and was gorgeous in white satin with orange flowers in her hat. Mr. Whitney, questioning the validity of the Western divorce, brought a suit in Westchester County for absolute divorce, and was given a verdict day before yesterday, whereupon Mr. and Mrs. Bandoine were re-married at once. The Oklahoma question remains unsettled at the present writing. Another re-marriage, I dare say, the telegraph has recounted to you. This is the one which re-united de Trafford Blackstone of Norwich, Conn., and his former wife. Since they separated, many years ago, each has re-married, he to lose his wife by death, and she her husband by divorce. The name Sadie Blackstone has been before the public for many years, both during and since her stage career.

March 4.

THE close of the ante-Lenten season is usually so well filled with gay doings, both large and small, the advent of Ash Wednesday is regarded as the herald of a delightful rest from the society treadmill which those who belong to the swim are obliged to keep at until Mardi Gras calls a halt for forty days at least. While the past season can hardly be called a brilliant one, there has been enough going on to prevent its being termed dull, and its last ten days especially had so much on the programme there could be no cause for complaint except upon the score of fatigue—and the weather.

It is rather an old story to say the Presidio hops are charming, but it must be confessed that there has seldom been a more delightful gathering at that popular post than the dance which took place there on Thursday evening of last week, the thought that it was to be the final one until after Easter probably adding zest to the enjoyment of all who participated. The Friday Fortnightlies gave their last dance the following evening, and it also was voted delightful. A few figures of the cotillon were danced late in the evening, Mr. Greenway leading with his usual ability. Saturday was largely given over by society to the tea at the Crocker mansion on Nob Hill, which was even a greater success than had been anticipated. The world and his wife were there in goodly numbers; the beautiful rooms were crowded as they have not been for many a season past, and the universal sentiment was, alas! that closed doors should there be the rule instead of the exception.

Society was divided in its allegiance on Monday night, the younger portion selecting the dance of the Saturday Night Class, which had its final gathering at Lunt's Hall on Monday evening, while others were seen in large numbers at the California Theatre, where the play of Caste was performed by a number of well-known amateurs, where each did so well it would be almost invidious to particularize, but it was admitted by all that Miss Leila Burton carried off the honors of the evening; the characters taken by her and Miss Rose Hooper fitted each to a charm, and they were fairly overwhelmed with the floral tributes offered at their shrine.

On Tuesday evening the Entre Nous Cotillion Club had their last dance in Maple Hall, under the leadership of Mr. Sanford Lewald; but the great event of Tuesday night was the Mardi Gras bal Masque, at the Hopkins Institute, for which preparations have been going on at that temple of art for nearly a month past, and the result was a scene of dazzling beauty when the doors were thrown open to the crowd which filled the rooms and made the ball one long to be remembered by all who took part.

Our worshipful Mayor was just himself—a simple, unpretentious gentleman from top to toe, and let me tell you that is the hardest rôle of all to carry, to judge by the fearful failures in society. Harsh? Yes, but so awfully true. Another capital exemplification of nature was the false-face worn openly by some women who have been noted for them in private life for years. Mrs. McLane-Martin's bicycle fall did not seem to interfere with her getting around pretty lively. She buzzed some of the old chaps until they were wild to find out who she was.

One of the cutest costumes was a bit of old delft, and Mrs. Tom Magee Jr. was beautifully got up as the stars and stripes. Mrs. Van Stowe was elegance itself in a white Arabian costume, but the "yashmak" round her face must have been frightfully hot. Howard Taylor played the mystifying dodge by changing his costume three times, one the devil himself.

The Maynard girls played the baby act sweetly, and the dolls they carried were enough to make any child want them. Laura McKinstry was a walking "Why?" and the gallant Colonel Crocker made a dashing attempt to solve the interrogation in an English hunting suit that was so dead letter perfect it made the B'linghamites pale with envy. Miss Jennie Blair's pretty little figure made her an easy pray to guessers, although her glorious hair was covered by a blonde wig. Mine Ziska was magnificently attired in pink and black, a court costume of the richest character, and carried herself with superb grace. It was funny to see the blue, pink, and white dominoes circle around General Barnes; and George Marye was another mark for the feminines, who seemed to take special delight in puzzling the old fellow. Emma Butler was in domino; so was Marjorie Young, Edith Findley, the Brooks girls (redivivus), Francis Moor, Helen Wagner, Mrs. George Howard, and Julia Crocker. Mary McNutt had Folly's dress.

Archibald, as a "big" Chinaman, was immense. Douglas Tilden was excellent as Miles Standish. There were so many in domino who wore lovely gowns underneath, it was more than confusing to guess "who was who." A girl from Wisconsin was dressed as a moth and Mrs. Adams as a goldfinch, the wings of each being a noticeable feature of their costumes. Alice Hager was a "lilac branch," and several men looked as though they would like to carry it off.

Although much was expected by those who attended the Concordia Club on Saturday evening last none of the five hundred present were disappointed.

The "Mystery of a Misfit Monarch" was the programme announcement—"Subtracted from The Prisoner of Zenda." The stage picture was a very pretty one and the acting and singing far above the average.

Milton S. Bremer, who took the leading female role of Antoinette, carried off the honors of the evening. His graceful carriage and the careful manipulation of his skirts caused many a young lady to blush with envy, and his songs were well received. The other characters were well sustained.

A splendid souvenir programme was gotten up for the occasion—containing pictures of the players—nooks and corners of the handsome club house and some of the musical selections from the burlesque. It made quite a hit.

After the fall of the curtain—a dance and supper followed. Handsome toilettes and brilliant jewels were the order of the evening. Particularly noticeable were Mrs. Maurice Rothschild in yellow silk en traine, Mrs. Chas. W. Rosenbaum in white, Mrs. S. W. Heller in a new creation of pink silk, and Mrs. Emanuel Heller in a white flowered silk trimmed with pale green.

It would really be difficult to pick out from such a set of pretty girls as have come out this winter who was the belle. The debutantes, some twelve in number, have run society with a queenly hand. Miss Rosie Neustadter in pink silk, Miss Norma Bachman, white tulle trimmed with cherries, Miss Rose Sachs in a pale green silk with black pipings; Miss Mildred Lewis called forth more than usual attention.

Who would not be an engaged girl? That is, if they possess so many friends as does Miss Ethel Cohen, who, since the announcement of her engagement to Lieutenant Bent was made public, has been fêted at dinner, luncheon and tea by those who claim that title. Possibly the prettiest of all these affairs was the tea given by Miss Woods on Tuesday, at which Miss Cohen and three other "engaged" girls, the Misses Burton, Whittier and Coleman, assisted the hostess in receiving. Another charming gathering was the luncheon given in her honor at the University Club by Miss Emma Butler. Mrs. Gerstle, Miss Ida Gibbons, Mrs. Moulder, etc. have also entertained Miss Cohen and Lieutenant Bent.

Other engagement entertainments include the dinner given by Miss Irma Rothschild, in honor of Hilda Levy and Josh Eppinger, who were married on Tuesday, and the dinner in honor of Miss Maybelle Gerst and Sam Naphthaly, at which Mr. and Mrs. Simon Anspacher were host and hostess to twenty-two guests; and among engagement announcements of recent date is that of Miss Amice Cellarius to Dr. Ernest Barry.

The Concordia Club rooms were called into requisition on Tuesday evening, when Miss Hilda Levy and Joshua Eppinger were united in marriage by Rabbi Voorsanger beneath a silken canopy placed on the north side of the hall. The decorations were both elaborate and beautiful, palms, ferns, smilax, orange blossoms, roses and violets being used with a lavish hand to produce a charming result. Messrs. Martin Triest, Sam Cook, Arthur Silverberg and Ben Rosenberg, who officiated as ushers, led the bridal procession as it entered the hall, at half-past eight, to the strains of the Lohengrin Chorus, played by the orchestra seated upon the stage. Then followed the bridesmaids, the Misses Birdie Hershman, Alice Bachman, Daisy Schweitzer and Rica Triest, who were costumed alike in white satin and tulle, with hand bouquets of bride's roses. Miss Julia Eppinger, as maid-of-honor, came next, her gown of white lace over white satin; and then came the bride, escorted by her brother, Charles Levy. Her robe was an exquisite one of white satin en traine, trimmed with point lace and orchids. She wore a wreath of orange blossoms, and a diamond sunburst, the gift of the groom, held her tulle veil in place, and she carried a bouquet of orchids and lilies of the valley. George Laverson was the groom's best man. Dancing followed the ceremony, then a sumptuous supper which was served in the banquet hall, and then there was more dancing. Coronado is where the happy couple are spending their honeymoon, and upon their return they will reside for a time at the Hotel Richelieu.

The engagement of Mr. Albert L. Ehrman to Miss Rosalie Neustadter, which was announced on Saturday last, has caused no end of talk on account of the high standing of both parties, the splendid match and good fortune of the young man. Miss Neustadter is an extremely handsome young girl of eighteen summers, and of the brunette type, she has coal black eyes and very refined features. Mr. Ehrman is blonde. He is a graduate of the University of California, and was popularly known by his club friends as "King of Bohemia." To them the engagement comes as a complete surprise. On Thursday evening Mrs. Fechtwanger entertained the newly engaged couple, Mr. Albert Ehrman and Miss Rose Neustadter, at dinner. Only a few intimate friends were present. The decorations were quite unique.

Particulars have just been received here of the wedding of Miss Bessie Crabbe and Lieutenant Gately, both of whom are well known in our swim. The ceremony took place at St. John's Chapel, Fort Hamilton, on the 11th of February. The bridal robe was of white satin, lace and chiffon, and the hand bouquet of white roses and lilies of the valley. Miss Lillian Brechemin, who officiated as maid-of-honor, was gowned in pink organdie over white silk, and she wore a white lace hat. Lieutenant Winston, recently of the Presidio, was the groom's best man.

On Tuesday afternoon a club jinks was given to the Pianists' Club, at the studio on Bush street, by Mrs. Wm. A. Deane, President of the club. The studio was lavishly decorated for the occasion, and the spread was a bountiful one. Every member was present, and each contributed her share to an entertainment of which, for genuine wit, humor, and originality, the male clubber might have been more than proud. In the evening, the ladies assisted Mrs. Deane in receiving a number of invited guests, mostly musicians. A fine musical programme was rendered, including piano solos by Mr. Samuel Fleishman, director of the club; vocal selections by the brilliant soprano, Madame Billoni-Zifferer; violin solos by Nathan Landsberger, and original songs by Mr. Locher. The audience, though small, was extremely appreciative, and the applause which followed each number was a genuine tribute to the performer. Refreshments and dancing followed, and as the members of the club separated, after singing their original club songs, they unanimously voted the afternoon and evening the most brilliant in the annals of the Pianists' Club.

Mr. Paul F. Mohr, who is well-known in financial and railroad circles, has been in the city for the past week on business. Mr. Mohr was formerly with the Northern Pacific, and was one of its builders. He is now building the railroad around the Dalles, in Oregon, besides being interested in other equally extensive enterprises.

Mr. and Mrs. Ed Schmiedell are once more in San Francisco, after having taken a tour round the world and making a stay in Paris, en route homewards, of several months duration. They arrived last week, and are for the present domiciled at the Palace.

Miss Alice Bachman's pink dinner to twenty-two of her young friends was one of the charming affairs of last week. Another one was the tea given by Mrs. W. V. Bryan, which was followed in the evening by a game of progressive euchre; and yet a third, the children's party at Mrs. P. N. Lilienthal's. On Tuesday last Mrs. Van Bergin's violet and daffodil luncheon was a very pretty and enjoyable affair.

The California Theatre will, of course, blossom like a rose next Wednesday night when the eagerly anticipated French Opera Company will make their first appearance in San Francisco. A number of opera parties have been arranged for not only that evening, but for others during the week, and it is safe to say that for those who do not regard the opera in the same light as the theatre during the Lenten period, it will be the one bright oasis in the desert of penitential darkness during the coming weeks.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at St. Denis Hotel, New York, are Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Spear, Mrs. M. F. Howe, and A. W. Grant.

Mr. Herman Oelrichs arrived from New York last Tuesday, and will remain in San Francisco for some time.

Practice makes perfect. That is why Max Abraham, 428 Geary street, is such a decided success at preparing banquets, dinners, and luncheons. He takes complete control, provides everything and guarantees perfect satisfaction. He is strictly up to date in every department of his business.

ART JOTTINGS.

A LANDSCAPE in pastel, by Latimer, was hung in the Bohemian Club rooms this week. A lonely mere reflects the latest light between the gloaming and the dark. The treatment is tender and full of sentiment, and the picture will rank among Latimer's best work.

The Century Club's exhibition continues to draw well. An effective picture by Elizabeth Strong, the beach at Monterey, looking south from the lighthouse, is strongly suggestive of Alick Harrison's style. There is a hazy purple in the air, and the picture is fine in color and light in tone.

Joseph D. Strong's portraits in pastel continue the fashion. Mrs. Dr. Winslow Anderson, Mr. H. Clift, Mr. H. J. Stewart and Theodore Payne are among the latest clients of this clever painter.

Gordon Ross is making some good studies of bay and ocean subjects. To Mr. Ross belongs the credit of designing the very striking costume worn at the Mardi Gras ball by Tony Hellman. His own, as a herald, was no less artistic. On the robe were three champagne corks in gold, against a black ground, and on the other side the hoodoo bird. When the question of what character Mr. Horace Platt should take at that function arose, Mr. Ross suggested that Mr. Platt should go as the "Famine in India." This hint Colonel Buntin improved upon by offering as a substitute that Mr. Platt appear as the "Valet of the Shadow of Death." Those well-meant counsels the President of the Art Association indignantly rejected, and made his bow to the admiring crowd as a humble student of most anything.

Charles Rollo Peters arrived from Monterey this week, where he has been making a number of studies of moonlight effects, one of which is on exhibition at the Century Club. When Mr. Peters has the desired number of these sketches worked up, he will exhibit in New York.

THE OPENING OF THE PABST CAFE.

The New Enterprise of the Royal Eagle Distilleries Company.

THE Pabst Café, located at the northwest corner of Powell and Ellis streets, and one of the most elaborately-decorated and complete establishments on the Pacific Coast, was thrown open for business by its proprietors, Messrs. Herbert, Sonderleiter & Rossum, last Wednesday. It is literally true that no expense has been spared in making this beautiful café a model of its kind; a place where the most wholesome food and all the delicacies of the season, prepared by skilled hands, may be enjoyed, surrounded by every elegance. It is the intention of the proprietors, all of whom are experienced men, to make Pabst Café a favorite resort of the families of San Francisco, and especial effort will be made to cater to refined family business, every arrangement being made in view of this intention. Private dining-rooms and a splendid German banquet hall, with appropriate emblems and terse quotations from attractions of the earth, afford opportunity for gratifying the most exclusive taste for the largest parties. Especial attention is called to the elegant paintings which decorate the walls of the gents and ladies' café, having copies from some of the most famous masters of the old world, appropriate to this establishment.

The Pabst Brewing Company is recognized as the largest in the world, and made famous by its special brew of fine beer. It is represented by the Royal Eagle Distilleries Company as their agents on the Pacific Coast.

AT THE RACES.

THE racing at Ingleside this week has been of the sensational order. Owing to the condition of the weather and the changing from a fast to a muddy track, mudlarks have had their innings for the last few days, some of them winning at the tempting odds of 100 to 1. Magnet, one of the crack sprinters of the West, has again made his appearance in California, and, as usual, captured his first two starts—the last race being one of the most exciting yet witnessed at Ingleside, when Maguet defeated Buckwa. The Schreiber Stakes, for two-year-olds, was captured by J. Naglee Burke's Estro, who was cleverly ridden by Sloan, and was as good as ten to one in the betting.

THE measure now before the Legislature, compelling foreign marine insurance companies to deposit $200,000 in the United States for the protection of their policy holders, is a belated effort to monopolize the business by companies not foreign. The history of marine insurance in this State shows that the people have never yet lost a cent by foreign marine insurance, every claim being promptly paid. These companies, too, have done their full share of the business, and have the confidence of the public without any such deposit.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 13, 1897.

 office as Second-class Matter.

 tion and advertising rates.

IF our friends, the Greeks, desire to return to their native land, in response to King George's call to arms, they should be stimulated in their patriotic impulses. We do not need the Greeks so badly as docs their sovereign. By all means, let them hasten to the banner of their country.

JUDGING by the great horde of hungry pap-seekers and suckers now hearing down upon President McKinley, the most uncompromising free trader should condone his cry for protection. The great need of it must hear a new and terrible significance to the nation's beleaguered Chief Executive.

THERE is a constitutional amendment now before the Legislature permitting this city to make payment for goods furnished by local merchants. The amendment should be adopted. San Francisco is able to pay all just claims, and the constitutional inability should be removed at the earliest moment.

THE action of the Legislature in finding Andy Lawrence guilty of contempt and ordering him to jail, was just and righteous. The unbridled license and brutal methods of the Examiner have become intolerable, and it is time that it receive a substantial reuke. It is a disgrace to San Francisco; an indecent publication, and its suppression would be a distinct moral gain to this community.

THE cause of temperance has been defeated in Oakland, say its defenders. The saloons will not be closed. The advocates of total abstinence will never learn a lesson from experience. It has been demonstrated time out of mind that prohibition does not prohibit. Freedom from the drink habit comes from moral suasion, not from sumptuary enactments; from voluntarily accepted beliefs of physical and mental betterment, not from cast iron laws. No local statute is stronger than a majority of that community to whom it applies.

GOVERNOR BUDD has signed the bill giving San Francisco a fully paid fire department. No one will object to this measure, which is in the line of greater efficiency and less politics. Lack of funds will prevent the immediate operation of the law; but within a year the re-organization of the department on this basis will doubtless be accomplished. Not the least of good things to follow this new idea will be the suppression of the heastly alarm whistles, whose harharic hellowings are almost as much to be dreaded as the fires they signal.

THE addition of something more than $12,000 to San Francisco's yearly police bill, does not call out spontaneous exclamations of delight outside of the immediate circle of the beneficiaries. Mayor Phelan truly represented the taxpayers of this city when he informed the Legislators that the people of San Francisco were opposed to an increase of salaries in the police department; that this was a poor time for increasing burdens. But it seems that those most concerned—that is, the people who pay the bills, are not to be considered. Their reasonable protests are no match for the organized assaults upon their pockets by worthless politicians, City Hall rings, and overpaid officials.

WORK on the boulevard will commence next Monday morning, and the laborers will be paid one dollar per day. This is a small sum, but it will serve to keep hunger from the door as long as it lasts. With the coming of spring, opportunities for employment will increase throughout the interior, and the needy be better able to care for themselves. Meantime contributions to the boulevard fund should be freely made, for every dollar will be wisely expended.

THE position of United States Attorney Jones of Nevada, who, while in the pay of the Government, drafted a bill and avoided the legal difficulties which prevented prize-fighting in that State, and who was compelled to threaten the undoing of his work before he could get his fee from Promoter Stuart, is not to be envied, either from a professional or moral standpoint. Stuart, it seems, unconsciously paid Jones an undeserved compliment when he presumed that the attorney would rather lose the money than disclose his hand in the transaction. Jones clearly belongs to Nevada.

IT will be well for captious and unreasonable critics to remember that the rights of way for the proposed boulevard from the Park to the Ocean represents a money value of from $50,000 to $75,000, and that the Spring Valley Company, which gives a great part of it, has no property to sell along the highway, and will not be benefited by the completion of the work. The gift of the hundred foot strip by the company is a generous and praiseworthy act. In the neighborhood of $10,000 are now in hand, and the work on this improvement will be commenced within a few days.

OFFICERS of the Southern California Christian Endeavor Union some time ago sent a carload of oranges to be sold at auction in New York, the proceeds to be applied to suffering Armenians. The oranges netted $923. This money will be devoted to the support of an orphanage at Harport, Turkey. Of course, it is all very well to aid Armenians, but one cannot refrain from thinking that there are a great many people nearer home who know what the bitterness of cold and the gnawings of hunger are. Ninety per cent. of the so-called missionary contributions are valueless. The money could be far better spent. The glory of God and the pocket of the missionary are often held to be entirely synonymous.

EVERY lover of honest racing will regret to hear that President A. B. Spreckels and Director Henry J. Crocker have resigned from the Pacific Coast Jockey Club, and that they will be followed by Directors Andrews and Tarpey. The action of these leading exponents of fair racing on the Pacific Coast is a great surprise, as the club was well patronized, and owing to the high standing of its chief promoters, possessed the entire confidence of the whole public. They redeemed horse racing in California from a very low level, and placed it among the honorable sports of the day. And this was no small task. The generous purses given, and the character of the sport attracted horsemen from all over the country. It is unfortunate for racing that Mr. Spreckels and his fellow officers of the club have determined to retire from its management. It is to be hoped, however, that those who succeed them will maintain the standard they rigidly adhered to. It is said that Police Commissioner Gunst is likely to take a prominent place in the future management of Ingleside. His reputation as a fair, square sportsman is recognized everywhere, which would mean much to the new organization.

"THE NEW JOURNALISM."

IF we are to judge of "the new journalism" by its performances it is a FAKE. It is gotten up to delude and humbug the unthinking part of humanity and will scruple at nothing that either attracts attention or nickels. Anything for a sensation is its rule, and it matters not whether it be true or false, moral or immoral, erotic or virtuous, blasphemous or religious, un-Godly, or Godlike, veneer for soundrelism, and sarcasm for everything that is true and of good repute. The New York World pioneered its way to financial success on these lies and now Hearst's two papers are trying to outdo their progenitor. The story went the rounds about three years ago that Mr. Pulitzer (the proprietor of the World) gave one of the brightest of his men a week off with explicit instructions to go around and find out what the business men and leading citizens thought of the World. At the end of the week the bright man went about his usual duties without reporting to the proprietor. For which he was promptly called to account. "Oh," said he, "you don't want to hear that stuff, it is all stuff, and disagreeable stuff at that." "Well, that is what I expected," said Pulitzer, "and that's why I sent you to find out just what it amounted to." Pulitzer persisting, the reporter had to say "he could not find a prominent citizen who spoke well of the World; that people never believed what it said, unless they read it in some other paper, that its drawings were nearly all mere imaginings and dirty ones at that, and that a majority of its sensations were FAKES." Mr. Pulitzer smiling said "that is just the way I want to have things. Whilst the snobs, very few in number, are talking that way I can be pretty certain how all the others are talking. The lovers of sensations make the World yield $800,000 a year, whilst the other sort of people allowed it to starve. The poor devil with a nickel which he wants to exchange for a "World" is more to me than Vanderhilt who declines to buy one at all. I am for the many as customers, and intend to supply the kind of goods they require." That is the New Journalism. That is the kind that young Hearst boasts of at the clubs, and in the other places that may not be so much as named. It seems to be one of the peculiarities of the New Journalism that it exercises its censorship of public morals from unspeakable places. It yells its loudest for people it intends to delude, succeeds in fooling them nearly every time, and always takes their money.

Yet this new journalism does not everywhere and always succeed. The Examiner started in to run the Legislature, but egregiously failed, because it never made out a case that thinking men trusted. The Clerk of the House and the Government Printer pulled through solely because of the sympathy created by the Examiner's exaggerated and brutal attacks. The Legislation it favored, met as a rule with disfavor. Only a few of the least harmful of its working-men's bills got through, and those it passed will remain as so many dead letters on the statute books. Braunhart's 2½ cent car fare was its pet measure, but in the end it was easily defeated, being opposed by the very class it was supposed to be in the most favor with. The Torrens land transfer act was going through swimmingly, until the Examiner came out in its favor, when it struck a snag, and its fate became uncertain. Its sensational pretence, during the dying hours of the Legislature, that wholesale bribery was being resorted to in order to kill a bill favoring changes of venue in certain cases was conceived in the country and was particularly applicable to the many counties with only one Superior Judge. Its authors had not so much as thought of its possible hearing on the Hale and Norcross Case. And there is one man, who, if he will do himself justice, will bear testimony that he and certain clients of his thought such a law necessary long before the Hale and Norcross case was tried. Attorney Baggett admits having been lobbying at Sacramento for the bill and Lawrence of the Examiner swears that he obtained about all he knew about the bribery of members to vote for it from Mr. Baggett.

An explanation is needed from both of these gentlemen. The one is attorney for Hale & Norcross, and a practical politician of some experience. The other it is needless to describe, further than to say that he is a pronounced sample of the "new journalist." In San Francisco, he wrote the sensational bribery charges in order to scare Governor Budd, timid mortal that he is, into vetoing a bill which he has heretofore favored, and lawyer Baggett was the inspiring cause of those articles, as he has been of much else. It is worthy of notice that the accounts of all these things in "the new journal" are as alike the accounts in all the other journals as coal is like snow. Made out of whole cloth, to scare a man whom it is easy to frighten, intended to serve a selfish, personal end, the charges of bribery appear in this case to be about as false as those against the Examiner in the Southern Pacific case were true. It is a false alarm, just as was the pretense of the Examiner that it was being boycotted by the corporations. Heads of families, who do not care to support a pugilist's organ, are abandoning it on all sides. Public libraries are finding it necessary to put it out of sight. And the stockholders and wage-earners are contemplating dealing only with their friends. That is about the best antidote for the "new journalism" we know of. In New York, they have just "caught on" to what Hearst's "Journal" means, and are taking a sure, but perhaps not the best, way of taking the sting out of it. Not to patronize it is to kill it off-hand. To appoint a censor to cut out all that is indecent in it, would render it unmarketable among the class of readers it appeals to, and slow death would overtake it in that way. The bill introduced at Albany provides that the Governor shall appoint a censor for every county of the State having a population of 10,000 or more, whose duty it shall be to eliminate all libelous matters, and all matters deemed by him to be inimical to the interest of the State, or known to him to be untrue." That is certainly a pretty pass to which to bring the American press. Yet all the reputable journals are approving of it. It is either this rascally "new journalism" or a censorship. Where the press will not hold itself in check, and act as its own censor, it is not surprising that decent people are thinking of supplying it with one. The Examiner, alone of all our daily papers, suppressed the dispatches as to this bill. It is really astounding that our time-honored freedom of the press is in real danger from its own license, faithlessness, evil-speaking, lying, slandering, and jobbery generally. A free and honorable press is the paladium of our liberties, but a false and mendacious one is an irritant upon the body politic, and a menace to everything that is true and of good repute. That is the "new journalism." That is the Examiner.

The Law As You may question a juror as to bias, and if
To Change he be not very clear that he has none, he
Of Venue. is at once dismissed from further consideration of the case at bar. A Superior Judge is the sole authority as to his own prejudices, and that is something no man is competent to be. All minds are prejudiced on some subjects, and none are at all times completely under the sway of exact reason. Legal minds are peculiarly apt to go wrong as the statistics of our lunatic asylums show. Campbell's great work, the lives of the Lord Chancellors, abounds in idiosyncracies and eccentricities, which afflicted almost every Chancellor that ever sat on the Woolsack. In England and in several States of our own Union changes of venue are at once made upon affidavit of either party, charging bias, and the same law exists in California, only it leaves the judge the sole authority of his own bias. You may prove an extraordinary state of facts against him, but if he says they are not true, he is the supreme authority as to that, as the Supreme Court has recently decided. Surely it is absurd for any man to be sole judge of a case, or point, to which he is practically the sole party. Justice and right, as well as good taste, require that when the venue is set, the case shall be tried before a judge without fear and above reproach, which he cannot be if affidavits have been filed making out a case of bias. Indeed, the details as to the cause of bias are seldom considered necessary, if the objection to the judge is taken at the beginning of a trial, or at the beginning of a new one granted for cause by the Supreme Court. The very overruling of the Court below in a complicated case, creates the presumption that either there was bias or inefficiency in the trial judge. Some one judge has got to try the case over again, in any event, and it can but add to the respect paid to the final result that either two judges concurred in it, or that the errors of the first were clearly pointed out by the second, and that upon review the Supreme Court found the second had correctly laid down the law, and satisfactorily closed the case.

In San Francisco, where there are twelve departments of the same Court, these matters are usually arranged amicably among the judges themselves. Where either party to a suit has cause of objection, a reassignment by the presiding judge, is usually made, and the practice finds favor all round. It is in the country, where the necessity for a change is really great and pressing. Make yourself distasteful to the members of the Court House ring of your county—a very easy thing to do—and thereafter you have no more chance of obtaining justice in that county than you have of procuring the gold bricks that pave the entrance to Heaven. A column giving facts known to us, would be really amusing, but we should, under the law as it exists, be liable to be called before the very judge involved, and we could not prevent his being counsel, judge, and executiouer. We know of a case in one of the bay counties that happened not long ago, in which a judge tried a case against a man, after a stipulation was agreed to in open court that it should not be tried, scoured the county for evidence, which he imported into a written opinion intended to destroy the character of the man he disliked, gave judgment against him, and assisted in getting that biased and false opinion circulated around the county. The luckless defendant jokingly remarks, although it is no joke, that if he were arraigned before that judge for killing a man who never lived, he believes he would be hauged ou general principles. It is, perhaps, needless to say that in nothing that constitutes good citizenship does that violent and prejudiced judge equal the man he hates. Will any just and decent man say that a change of venue ought not to be had in such a case? We know in another bay county a Superior Judge who rendered a decision in these words: "The act of the Legislature is hereby amended and made to read as follows:"—The act alluded to was the county government law which put the county in a lower classification than the ring thought right. The officials raised a question, took it before the judge of the county, and to-day are receiving from 40 to 50 per cent higher salaries than they otherwise would. It is a monstrous thing for a man living in any county that has but one judge to be at the mercy of that judge and of his friends. In many of the cow counties there should either be travelling Judges, or easy changes of venue. Governor Budd has been known long ago to express this opinion.

The Finishing Days of The Legislature. These are the days when the preparations for the final "clean up" are usually made, and accordingly the closing days of the Legislature are generally deemed the most dangerous. But it is only due to the present session to say that it is sticking fairly well to good and useful working, and avoiding scandals that are not fakes. It could do no less, but might have done more in the matter of the faked one the Examiner got up; but the exposure of Lawrence upon the stand was about the worst punishment that could hefall him. In very pity we say no more of him. The appropriations have hardly been kept down to the point which these hard times called for, and the Governor will again have to call his pruning knife into requisition. We hope he will cut deep, and spare nothing that can be lopped off. The cost of running the State affairs of California is out of all proportion to the appropriations of many much more populous States. We have got to learn the ways of economy, and can never begin at a better period than the present. The Legislature has dealt with unusual care with a greater number of leading questions than has been the rule. We can recall several of first-class importance, and many that call for no serious objection. Should any bad bills have crept through, the Governor's veto remains as effective as ever. We fear that the rearrangement of the Supreme Court's business is not likely to go through in a satisfactory shape. Too many cooks are spoiling the broth, and some of them are spoiling it for a purpose. The Torrens Land Transfer Act is nearly through, and should not be forgotten in the closing day of the session. It will be something to say in the near future, that the last was not the worst Legislature California ever had.

Schemes that have Gone Awry. When the new States were admitted to the Union, it was said by the Republicans the Senate would thereby be given to their party for a generation to come. Now that the new Senatorial seats are nearly all filled, they do not secure a single one. The Rocky Mountain States all send either a Democrat or a Populist. Think of that, ye schemers and politicians! The Republicans will not control the Senate in the very first Congress immediately following the greatest victory but one that party has ever gained at the polls. And the future of those States, who shall guess it? The assertions of bribery have been many and loud, and where there has been so much smoke there certainly has been some fire. The prices have been disgustingly low. From $400 to $150 have, it appears, sufficed to buy a legislative vote. At those figures, it would be possible for one millionaire to buy enough votes to give him perpetual control of the treaty, and patrouage-co-ordinating body, which, at the same time, is a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature of the nation. A consideration of these facts render the situation an alarming one. Even now, it is impossible to tell what destiny will shape the ends of legislation during the next four years. It is going to be a ticklish period. Yet the Populists undoubtedly hold the balance of power. It is, no doubt, a weakness in the Constitution of the United States that it allots as much Senatorial power to States like Idaho and Wyoming as to those of New York and Pennsylvania. Great as the disparity is to-day, it will grow greater. Based upon no principle of equal representation, it is foreign to justice, equity, and all that is distinctively American. The Senate promises to be fruitful of trouble for some time to come.

Official Interference In Private Litigation. Our esteemed contemporary "the Call" has with much force been saying a great deal that is true about police interference in private litigation. There no doubt have been times when that interference was spite work, or intended solely for gain, or to oppress a disliked litigant. These are grave allegations, but at one time they were too notoriously true to permit of any serious attempt at denial. The "Call" demonstrates that the bad old practice has been revived and is doing what it can to render it odious. Yet there are times when the police may properly interfere in litigation. The chief of the detective department, in the course of a published interview, pointed out the undoubtedly correct position for the police to take in such matters. "Whenever evidence of crime is present in a case, the police are in the line of duty in ferreting it out, to the end that the truth may appear, and crime be punished. At the same time these services are rendered the poor as well as the rich, for the police are not respecters of persons." He might have added that in both cases no pay is exacted, otherwise the police becomes a power that only the rich may use. But, as far as he went, the aged Captain laid down rules that will bring him honor long after his advancing years have done their worst; if those rules are hut lived up to. We have never known but two cases in which this rule had weight, but are very willing to believe that hoary heads may become crowns of righteousness.

Advertising Central California. The dispatches a few days ago informed us that a party of three hundred tourists had left New Orleans for California—presumably Los Angeles; and these tourists are now doubtless enjoying themselves amidst the orange groves and real estate dealers south of the Tehachapi mountains. There is nothing unusual about these visiting Easterners; they are but hundreds of the many thousands who annually journey to Southern California for health, recreation, and investments. No section of the country of which we have knowledge owes more to "birds of passage" than our Southern neighbors. They have grown rich and opulent through a just appreciation of their surroundings and a wise intelligence of the advantages of advertising native resources to the world. In the past fifteen years Southern California has been casting this sort of bread on the waters, and it is being returned to them in accessions of valuable immigration, permanent investments and material development.

The results of a few years' intelligent effort in that part of the State demonstrate the certain effect of judicious advertising, and give to the northern and central part of California an object lesson worthy of imitation. It is high time that the different organizations in San Francisco should take the initiative, and crystallize the many theories of which this city is most prolific into practical action. The fact is that the Eastern and middle-western States know very little of the capabilities, the climate, and the opportunities of Central and Northern California. There should be established in some central point beyond the Rockies a bureau of information, where reliable and exact information touching these prevailing conditions could be obtained. These statistics might be furnished by the various county officials, and should be classified as to soil, price and methods of payment, adaptability, cost of reaching the different sections, average yield and approximate profits per acre, on different products, and the time that would elapse before the immigrant could reasonably expect his venture to become self-supporting. To collect and put into clear and convincing form all these vital facts would require time, patience and a little money; but to the immigrant such information would be the strongest argument possible, and to the parts of the State represented worth their cost a thousand fold. The work to be effective would have to be methodical; but once the facts were obtained their compilation would be simple. Spasmodic and hasty action would avail little. Better to begin right, although it take a longer time. Probably six months would be required to obtain the necessary statistics at the very least; but better wait a year rather than undertake such a campaign without reliable, exact, and abundant material. The entire cost of compilation, printing, and maintenance of Eastern offices, could be justly taxed against the different counties represented—much as the Board of Trade exhibit is at present sustained in this city.

It will be remembered in this connection, that the Southern Pacific Railroad may be depended upon to aid in every way any intelligent effort to induce immigration. C. P. Huntington stated when he was last in San Francisco that the road would do everything possible in aid of such a concerted movement. The company has a vital interest in the proposition, and will be found anxious to support it on any reasonable basis. The State Development Committee, the Merchants' Association, and other organizations now considering the advertising of Central and Northern California in the East, should begin their labors at once. We have no doubt that they will find every county north of the dividing range willing and anxious to join them.

As to Street Paving. The action of the Supervisors in providing for a complete test of the merits of different kinds of street paving at a recent meeting, puts that important matter in a fair way toward intelligent future action. The resolution applied more particularly to trials for brick, wood, and asphalt, inasmuch as bitumen has long been accepted as the standard for street paving here. It has been claimed that heretofore no other material could get a chance to demonstrate its worth, owing to the inside influence of the bitumen companies. The desirability of bituminous pavements on streets that are not subjected to the heaviest traffic, has long been admitted; and where the work has been honestly done, it seems to meet the requirements of durability, noiselessness, and cleanliness. Whatever influences may have heretofore kept out all competition as to the different kinds of paving material, the action of the Board in providing for practical working tests of the three new materials—wood, asphalt, and artificial brick, opens the way for a demonstration of quality that will be valuable in the future. The Merchants' Association has asked the Supervisors to insert in all contracts for paving a provision requiring the contractors to keep in repair, free of charge, all street work done by them, for a period of five years after its completion. There could be no more direct or certain way of securing honest street work. The contractor who is under a valid bond to keep his paving in repair for five years, must, in order to protect himself, use good material and exercise care in executing his obligations. In the past, San Francisco has been robbed by careless work on the streets, and there has been little effort made to compel a reformation or bring the guilty contractors to justice. It does not appear on the records of the Board that the request of the Association was accepted as to all future work; but was applied in the contract soon to be let for paving Geary from Powell to Kearny street. It should be adopted and made a part of every foot of work hereafter done in San Francisco.

When Are Communications Privileged. A great deal is being said just now as to what constitutes privileged communications. It is of the utmost importance that men in their respective walks of life should know exactly what the law demands of them in this connection. It requires of every sane person "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," about any matter that is the subject of testimony. There are, however, a very few exceptions to this general rule. Husbands and wives cannot be compelled to testify against each other, religious, legal and medical confessions are also privileged, and a man may not, if he so elects, give testimony against himself. All else in this world that can be realized by any one of the seven senses, may be made subjects of competent testimony and must be revealed at the instance of any court of competent jurisdiction. The time has not long passed when journalists were required to have these very elementary principles regarding privileged communications at their finger ends. Under the New Journalism, however, every vile slander is privileged which the manager may chose to say was told him in confidence. Upon that slender basis, no charges can be refuted and no man's character is safe. Let the fact be understood once for all, that no statement made to a newspaper attaches, by his employer, or by anybody else, is, or can be the subject of privilege. The Judge who would rule that a false charge given to a newspaper man for publication was privileged, would rule that decent society could not exist, and that the vendetta had better come again. As to telegrams, a mere drag net cast at them for the purposes of mischief alone, cannot fetch them. The "investigator must know something about them, must have seen them, or be able wholly or in part to state their contents. If this were not so, no business man would be safe, the telegraph would fall into disuse, and the only man the law would permit the indulgence of privileged communications would be "the new journalist."

Unwarranted Interference. The circumstances attendant upon the death of millionaire Oakley at the Palace Hotel, in this city, last week, are well known. It will be remembered that a physician had called some time previous to his death, and that he had all the medical attention possible. That immediately after he died, the physician who had attended him was called, and with a full knowledge of the case, issued a certificate showing the cause of his demise. There was no attempt made to cover up anything vital to this matter upon the part of the management. The cause of death was perfectly clear and was legally established. The Coroner, however, urged on by the criminally sensational newspaper accounts, insisted upon making a second examination, and demanded that the body and the effects of Oakley should be placed in his possession. Manager Kirkpatrick promptly refused to entertain the unnecessary, unreasonable and impertinent demand of Coroner Hawkins, and in response to the instructions of the relatives of deceased shipped the body home. By the courtesy of the manager the coroner was permitted to make a quasi-official examination of the effects of the dead man. A great noise has been made about the obstruction of the coroner by the hotel people. As a matter of fact there was nothing to investigate. The causes of death were fully established, and Coroner Hawkins interested himself entirely beyond his official scope when he noised and fumed about the Palace Hotel. Manager Kirkpatrick was justified by all the facts, in vigorously turning the meddlesome official down. If there had been occasion for the services of the coroner the Palace management would have been the first to notify that official. As his presence was unnecessary he was very naturally disregarded. The coroner should not take his cue from the daily newspapers.

THE ART EPIUREAN.

(SEVENTH PAPER.)

IN this, the "seventy" of my sermon, it tardily occurs to mind that the title to these papers should not have been so limited; there is such a temptation to take little excursions into foreign territory; to enlarge upon little side issues that crop up. It should have been called "Things," and then I should not have felt guilty at drifting from the subject ever and anon and pulling up with a round turn in consequence. For instance, I saw such a pretty picture to-day that it simply must go down here, yet you who are reading for recipes will have scant patience at this stretching of canvas and setting of "palate" just for the result of painting a little picture in monochrome—even the high lights must be supplied by your own imagination. And even though only hinted at, it might not be forgiven by the unwitting models. However, "I'll take a bond of fate," for it was my good fortune the other day to stumble upon the prettiest domestic idyl you could imagine; and in this fin de siècle page in the history of our days, the refreshing picture was so pleasant that I am sure Mrs. Arthur T. Regenshurger will forgive me for telling about a little side issue that came under my observation while her husband was telling me about a new way of cooking oysters, one rainy morning. He was deep in the mysteries of this dish, the apple of his eye, when a sweet feminine voice called, "Arthur." (It must have been from the apple of his other eye!)

It came from the mysterious regions in the annex or wherever the culinary department is situated, and I pricked up my ears, for it seemed to open a way through a wall that had confronted me for some time—that the San Francisco housewife, is not, as a general thing, the hausfrau that the term implies.

"That is my wife," the doctor explained. "She is making marmalade and it is the first time that she has tried it, so she wants me to superintend it."

Now doesn't that bring up a pretty picture? I wouldn't have missed it for the world. It has restored my faith in woman. And then just fancy what a stroke of genius it was on her part to go to hubby for instructions. The dear man won't dare to laugh at her if the oranges fail to marmalade, or whatever they call it. But that is beyond the bounds of possibility if the doctor engineers the performance, and there is little in the culinary line that he has not mastered. After that pathetic little appeal for help I took a swift departure, not wishing to hinder by a second the success of that marmalade, and I only hope it turned out as sweet as the voice of the unseen mama-lady.

The doctor is a man of many parts; besides being a successful D. D. S., a 'celloist whose music speaks to the heart, a fancier of thoroughbred dogs, he is an adept in the art of concocting dainty dishes that would tempt the palate of a confirmed dyspeptic. Have you heard of oysters à la Regenshurger? Something between an oyster stew and oysters à la poulette. He starts it like a poulette, but makes it a trifle thicker with flour. He takes the oyster juice and milk, about half and half—perhaps a little more milk—and lets it come to a boil. Then he seasons this with tomato ketchup, anchovy sauce, Worcestershire sauce, and lime juice, putting in butter about the size of a walnut; salt and pepper, but not much salt, as the anchovy sauce furnishes that quality. When this has come to a boil, stirring it all the time, add California oysters and leave on the fire only long enough to thoroughly heat them. Cooked they become tough.

The doctor has had to give up his dogs since moving down town, and perhaps the death of his heauty prize-winner "Reglov," a while ago, caused him to lose interest in his canine pets. The handsome St. Bernard was strangled by his own chain one day, where the doctor had him with five other of his canine pets "hoarding out." He was almost as much attached to him as he would have been to a child, as he had owned him ever since the dog was nine months old, having imported him from the east. Reglov was named for his former owner, reversed—Volger. His hench show valuation was $5,000, but the money has not been coined that would have purchased him. All the doctor has now by which to remember him is a life-size oil portrait.

But agnin, this is not keeping strictly to my text, and I am brought back to a realization of delinquency by the memory of a recipe for a Welsh rarebit that cannot be duplicated by any connoisseur in San Francisco. Mr. James Gibb, importer, forty years ago obtained the recipe for this from Commodore Watkins of the Pacific Mail Company. Mr. Gibb assures me that the reason it is so well liked is on account of its simplicity. There is in it no highly seasoned ingredient that would destroy the cheese taste. He says that Dan'el O'Connell can make a rarebit that is something to dream over—and he doesn't mean a nightmare, be assured—but Daniel will use garlie in its composition, and that, Mr. Gibb thinks, is fatal. So this is the way he does it:

Take good American cheese (preferred to the English for this purpose) and chop very fine four pounds of it. The seasoning is one tablespoonful of good English dry mustard, one-quarter teaspoonful Crosse & Blackwell cayenne pepper, one teaspoonful Worcestershire, one quarter teaspoonful salt, one wine glassful porter. Put the condiments into a teacup and then add the porter. Work it well into a cream with a spoon. Now as to the cooking. Have a sharp, clear, quick fire. Put the frying pan on the fire and let it get "piping" hot. Put into it of the best butter obtainable about the size of a walnut, and run it around the pau to moisten every part of it. Then put the finely chopped cheese into the pan and spread with a fork. Note the utensil; spread in evenly over the pan with the tines moving flat along the bottom of the receptacle to avoid the dire possibility of the cheese burning on. Then throw in the contents of the teacup, stirring with the fork held flat all the time. Watch it with an eagle eye, and in about three minutes it will be melted and begin to hubble. Have at hand a hot platter covered with thin slices of quickly toasted bread with crusts cut away, and at the appointed time—if you hesitate you are lost—pour the rarebit over the toast and serve immediately. Don't think you can improve this by letting it cook a wee bit longer; it will ruin it. Brisk, hot fire, everything ready at the right moment—then you will make a success of Mr. Gibb's Welsh rarebit.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

A PARTICULARLY interesting illustration is presented with this issue of the NEWS LETTER—the interior of a Chinese theatre, showing the stage, the boxes, and rows of semi-circular seats. There is a noticeable absence of comfort in the picture, which demonstrates clearly that the Chinaman takes his theatrical amusements very seriously. It was this theatre that was visited last year by Paderewski, who declared himself charmed by the music that is the doleful and continuous accompaniment of all Chinese plays.

MOTHERS, be sure and use "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for your children while teething.

AT a few minutes after eight o'clock somebody made a speech in which travel, tribulation and forgive the mise-en-scène were mentioned. Then the band sounded the prelude and Giacomo Meyerbeer's hundred-ton tragic-romance L'Africaine was under way and the season of opera at the California commenced. Prevost's silver top-notes and Mlle de Consoli's steel tip-notes had missed the from-New-Orleans-to-San-Francisco-special-train that carried the rest of the company—and without a tenor top or a ballet bottom there could be no Trovatore for the opening. So L'Africaine met the first nighters in all but one scene of its ponderous entirety. At half after twelve o'clock Selika died under the mancanilla tree. And those who did not have carriages walked.

A full potion of Meyerbeer's mancanilla induces slumber, and it also induces hunger and thirst: most of us waked to the grosser thought of food and drink. The morning sun is paling the gas as I write, and I am introspecting to discover how much I enjoyed it at all. It is sometimes a pleasure to find people on the stage who are not great. This French opera boasts no greatness. Nobody claimed greatness for it in advance, and nobody proclaims it now. At least not I, who heard L'Africaine all, from commencement to close—bar the little winks between. But Henri Albers was on the verge. There are surge, spring and a cello's breadth in his big, hurning harytone and the true dramatic glow in his acting. He gave us poor Nelusko's heart—all its tender throbs and jealous leaps and noble pride, sacrifice and despair. One could not ask for an operacharacter more vivid. And it missed perfection by a petty and usual accident of vocalism: Albers' notes sagged below the pitch when they were softest, and blared above it when they were most vehement. Still this was only a speck on the sun, and Albers was the surprise of the night. No one looked for virtuosity. We were promised ensemble, and we forgot to miss it while Albers was in the scene. I can look back unenthusiastically and remember that the choruses did not sing as one, or even two persons, and that the orchestra, even recognizing the facts that its musicians were not all made in France, and the hours had been few for rehearsals, was oftener than not an impediment to the singing. All of which does not discourage me in the least. The company came on the jump and had to grapple with the heaviest, darkest opera in the repertory. Massart proved that he is a good tenor, Fedore that she is a good soprano, Berthet that among the lesser singers there is a clean, true, serviceable soprano, and Athes that he is an easy and legitimate, if a light-weight basso. And there are willing voices in the chorus that await hetter discipline. L'Africaine is not a repertory's joy under the hest of circumstances; it demands hard work from the singers and hard attention from the audience; it is protracted and ponderous, and unlit by a single gleam of humor. Even the parade and ballet music is glum and uncheerful. I wonder it did not sober up the leader of the Amazons on the spot. There were breaks and waits and uncertainty in the first performance, but so far as the dullness of it went, Meyerbeer must carry his full share. And do not forget that the famous septette was famously sung.

* * *

Vasco di Gama comes nearer to having a real lyric time of it than any other character in the opera, and the music found a suave, fluent voice and good vigor in Massart. It took all of the first act and part of the second to melt Massart's plump throat and encourage him to a tenor's valor. Then he was brave indeed, and tactful, too, with a delicate caress in his mezza voce that, I think, we will find his most lasting charm. "O Paradiso" was sung well enough to have been heard again had the opera been given the other end first.

Foedor's voice has the mellow mezzo quality that implies dramatic feeling whether the singer has it or not. I think Foedor has—though she had some very wooden moments Wednesday night and showed little of the enterprise one expects from the French. I prefer to find out how much I admire her when she is less obviously fatigued and not so much the butt of a scrambling orchestra. Poor Selika! she got the very worst of that Wednesday night's orchestra—and it ruined her death scene. Still Nicosias (who directed) deserves a small flower; if he could not keep his musicians together he did the next best thing: he gave them the pianissimo cue whenever there was the smallest chance for it.

After all the happy fukes of Modjeska's season at the Baldwin Theatre, I knew that it would be pressing fortune too hard to ask as much, or anything like as much, of Haworth's week at the Columbia. So I did not expect to see an all-round performance of Ruy Blas Monday night. I knew the players had been quickly culled from the available unemployed, and I went armed for a slipshod first night, a tangled ensemble and the utter absence of character or distinction in every part but Haworth's. I even anticipated Mr. Friedlander's friendly reminder that it all had been done in three days, and on the way out I wondered why he had not said three hours—it would have been more plausible, and it would have taken nothing from the glory of the enterprise. So, having compromised with myself in advance, I shall say nothing about the lusty chorus of Spanish Grandees, nothing about the strenuous Don Salluste of Mr. Carl Smith, nothing about the comic-operose duenna of Miss Madge Carr Cook, and not a word concerning the role of Marianne of Neuborg, which Miss Margaret Craven treated as an ice-cream soda, and swallowed with hubbles and cold lumps, and ohs and ahs and yums and cramp. I would rather discuss Haworth's feat of acting Ruy Blas, which was accomplished in spite of the accompaniment of these various ladies and gentlemen, and a Chopin nocturne (one in E flat, I believe) done in popular, desponcent orchestration, and wailed by the strings with a deathless insistence that survived the last curtain. Haworth played the part, and more than justified his pretentious to "the romantic;" but his lot was not altogether a happy one. In the first place he played for a curtain-raiser, A Man of the World, the little sketch that Gus Thomas drew around Barrymore's suave swagger and lissome tailoring and other personal scenery and effects; and no matter what Haworth's opinion of himself in the part may have been prior to Monday night's performance, or what were the circumstances of his playing it, or what impression his diamond-studded shirt bosom and mouse-colored plush dressing-gown may have made on a Columbia audience, I think his dearest enemy (if you can imagine Haworth with an enemy) will not ask so much as to see him twice in the part. I could stand Barrymore as Macbeth, John Drew as King Lear, or May Irwin as Camille, and never spill a tear—but Haworth as a man of the world! oh! it is too much. If you can imagine Edwin Booth, returned to earth in diamond studs and a William H. Crane household robe, lending his mystic presence to such a part as Barrymore's in this piece, or Drew's in A Squire of Dames, you can appreciate something of what I suffered through going early to the Columbia Monday night.

It seems I am one of the few persons in the town who never saw Booth in Ruy Blas; and while I do not hold comparison the most vital feature of dramatic criticism, I regret my inability to compare the two actors in the playing of the role. It seems almost futile to bring up Salvini, whom we all saw play Ruy Blas several years ago. Salvini had the romantic temperament, if ever man had—the fever, the color, the Latin grace—but he had not acquired (at least he had not when we saw him last in San Francisco) the fine pose and discrimination of the actor who is grounded in the technique of his craft. Haworth, besides his inherent gifts of ardor, poetry and old-worldness, is an adept in the business and values of the stage. In his mind the stage and the audience are surely placed; he is not satisfied with feeling the part himself, he knows the distance, the degree of magnification, the illusion which must be surmounted before the external picture and the internal feeling are adjusted to the audience. Where Salvini held us by magnetism and an occasional tour de force, and the realization of what a splendid fellow Salvini was, Haworth takes a slower, tenser, deeper grip on our imaginations, and makes us see Ruy Blas as he himself sees him; and while he has the same disdain that Salvini had for the tailor-made naturalism and other forms of ultra-modernity which are indispensable to the acting of a play, say by Pinero, his shading is so subtle, his heroism so absorbingly human, his play-acting so candid, yet so artful, that they bring a measure of exactness and conviction to us tired, prosaic people of the audience, which makes pink romance and red swords and sacrifice and speeches seem almost as true and a thousand-fold more beautiful than the Seventh Commandment anxieties of New Century dramatists. It is not in even William Winter's version of Ruy Blas (the one Haworth plays) to make one hold it up as a model for the art of dramatic action, and it surely is not in the company at the Columbia to give us the atmosphere or the mere semblance of managers of early Spain or early anything else, and it is hard to estimate just how much more Haworth might have done under more favorable circumstances. As it is, I can think of no other American actor who, given every advantage of environment that was denied Haworth Monday night, could do more with the part, either in the figure of the man, or the manner of voicing, or in its psychologic lucidity. I remember but one bad feature of Haworth's work: that was the rather monotonously musical way in which he intoned some of the less intense passages.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Out of the five new acts at the Orpheum, five are huge successes. Walter never brought out a better cargo: The Flying Jordans, the horizontal barristers, Marlo and Marlo, the multi-headed Olifans, Virginia Aragon the pearl of high-wire premieres, and John Burke are all top-notch exponents of their separate lines of variety craft. Burke is simply immense. He is no longer the quaint, suggestive, extra-dry Burke of Aladdin, but an out-and-out variety star, with gags neither too high nor too low, but just in the right between for a variety audience. And his songs are any man's mirth—the crowd clamors for not less than ten of them every night. See Burke, observe his success, and never again believe that a vaudeville comedian cannot be funny without being vulgar.

Two dancing acts will be added to the Orpheum's bill next week—the Four Cohans, who style themselves "automatons and doll dancers," and Keating and Walker, comedy dancers.

This afternoon at the California the French Opera Company will sing Faust; to-night the new comedy opera, Miss Helyett, introducing the comedy stars of the company. Two of the four works to be given next week are new—Noces de Jeannette and Sigurd. A special interest will be felt in the performance of Reyser's Sigurd, which will give us a French composer's treatment of the favorite myths of Wagner. Holvey's La Juive, an opera we have not heard in years, is the bill for Saturday afternoon. Now that the rush of the first night is over we may look for the brilliant ensemble, good staging and sumptuous ballet work that won the company such esteem in New Orleans.

The old musical comedy of Pinafore is doing so well at the Tivoli that the management announce its continuance for another week. It is doubtful if the Tivoli has ever given the good ship Pinafore as elaborate a mounting as the present one. She is an iron-clad this time, with all the improvements known to naval experts. The company gives new life to the music, mirth and satire. Several new songs and some excellent dancing are introduced. The Merry Wives of Windsor follows.

Cissy Fitzgerald, the young woman who has winked herself into world-wide repute, comes to the Columbia Monday night in The Foundling, a farce-comedy that ran 200 nights in New York. The press agent says: "Cissy is a blonde sunburst whose heavenward pointed toe, golden curls and sparkling eyes enthrall the world." Chums, a one-act farce, will raise the curtain.

Two soloists at Thursday's symphony concert—Mrs. Gertrude Auld-Thomas, vocalist, and Hugo Mansfield, pianist. Mr. Mansfield will play the Raff concerto, a work demanding tremendous execution. Hinriehs has selected the overture to Schubert's Genoveva, Svendsen's "Norwegian Artist's Carnival" and Massenet's famous suite "Les Erinnyes" for the orchestral numbers.

There being no opera Monday night many first-nighters will go to the Baldwin to see Fanny Davenport in her latest Sardou play, Gismonda, which is described as a drama strong, brutal, vigorous and telling. This is Miss Davenport's last Sardou season, and the only performance of Faloni will be given Saturday night. Melbourne McDowell heads the supporting company.

THE gay season wore itself out on Monday night with the Patriarch's ball, and on Tuesday with the dance of the "Howling Swells," as they are vulgarly designated at Sherry's. The afternoon of Tuesday was devoted to the entertainment at the Wal'corf for the Lisa Day Nursery, of which Mrs. George Crocker was one of the leading promoters. It was totally different from the usual charity entertainment, which rarely goes outside the line of strictly sentimental or even melancholy diversion (except, of course, for the great ball, which is perhaps the saddest thing ever given in New York), and took up vaudeville. Josephine Hall in "Sister Mary Jane's Top Note," Press Eldridge from the Music Halls, Deys the dancer, and artists of their calibre, were responsible for the amusement of the immense audience (at two dollars and a half a head). May Irwin was expected to sing "Crappy Dan" and "I Want Yer, Ma Honey," but a sore throat prevented her appearance.

Strangely enough, with the beginning of Lent the theatres in New York suddenly awoke from their lethargy and burst upon the community with an explosion of new plays and adaptations. La Falote, at the Casino, has charming music, but Mr. Cheever Goodwin has tried so nobly to make a libretto "funny without being vulgar" out of a very naughty French book, that he has produced something too dispiriting for words, and many of the audience on Monday night stole softly and sadly away at the end of the first act. I am told that those who struggled against despair were rewarded by the gayety of the last act, which was contagious. But there were not many to enjoy it. It is painful to begin longing for home and mother in the first hour of a play.

Mrs. Minnie Maddern Fiske, on Tuesday night, supported by that fine artist, Charles Coghlan, and an admirable and even cast, produced Stoddard's dramatization of Tess of the d'Urbervilles. No one who has read Hardy's novel can fail to realize its dramatic possibilities, and the playwright may congratulate himself upon his splendid work. The last act alone is open to criticism. It is too long. Tess is not executed as in the book, but dies at the altar of the Sun in the arms of Angel Clare. It is interesting to notice that on each re-appearance of Mrs. Fiske critics discover her. In point of fact, she has long been recognized as the most thoroughly artistic woman on the American stage, and some of her work shows positive genius. Her long retirement from the stage was a distinct loss to the dramatic history of this country.

At Piney Ridge is another new play which has captured New York. It is melo-drama in its best sense. Frohman will bring out Never Again, a French adaptation, on Monday night. And so, no more of the theatre. Damrosch opens at the Metropolitan on Monday; Nordica, whose quarrel with de Reszke (perhaps "difference" sounds more polite than quarrel), has never yet been settled; and Lilli Lehmann, with Kalisch and Fischer, should ensure him a success. London has sent over a young 'cellist, Leo Stern, whose sister, by the way, is married to John Hare's son. He is said to be very clever.

The Inauguration is the sole topic of conversation. San Francisco shares somewhat in its glory, since three San Franciscans are in the Presidential party. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Alexander have gone over to Washington. Ulysses Grant is there. Also Senator Jones, although he will not, perhaps, be so enthusiastic as others. Leonidas Scooffy and his very pretty bride will be there, I am told, and the recent bride, Mrs. Kirkpatrick (Mollie Torbert) and her husband.

Mrs. Oelrichs has again organized her Lenten sewing class—a very generous charity, by the way, for it is not amusing to sew gingham and flannels. Its recompense is in itself, this work!

Caspar Warrington Whitney is, I hear, about to re-enter the marriage state. The prospective bride is very young and very pretty. I wrote you last week of his former wife's marriage.

PASSE-PARTOUT.

THE CALIFORNIAN CHIPPY BIRD.

O H, haven't you heard
Of that wonderful bird
Indigenous chiefly to 'Frisco?
It is female by sex
And it hungrily pecks
At the wads in the pockets of dissolute wrecks—
Yes, the bird is decidedly brisk, oh!

Every town has its freak,
But a bird that can speak
And is given to dancing and drinking,
Is a thing to cause pride
In our breasts to abide,
And, more than all this, it will not be denied
It must set all the savants a-thinking.

This wonder is ours
And by all the powers,
The marvels of old are not in it;
It is always on tap
And we don't fear a rap
That we every shall lose it by any mishap—
The bird can be seen every minute.

'Tis the chippy hird, sir,
And it makes quite a stir
In the districts the chappies inhabit;
It will willingly eat
Either fish, fowl or meat
Or the dish that is famous as pickled pigs' feet.
And it isn't opposed to Welsh rare-bit.

In the cheerful saloon
It will chatter and spoon
And indulge in the breeziest diction;
It will order the drinks
While the chappie just blinks.
"What manner of bird is this chippy?" he thinks,
And his brain is the home of confiction.

It will also he found
In the dives underground
Where it hops to the squeaks of the fiddle.
Where the sailor blows in
His superfluous tin
The chippy will hover with smirk and with grin
And will do him up clean to his middle.

And the soldier boy, too,
Very often must rue
The greed of this featherless charmer,
To whom, so they say,
Every man is fair prey,
Especially he who just blooms for a day—
The festive and frivolous farmer.

On the Barbary Coast
There is quite a large host
Of chips that make very fair wages;
They revel in paint
And they're all very quaint
Though none could he classed as an out-and-out saint,
And all are at home in the cages.

Of course you will say
It is merely their way
And only the stranger should wonder;
But I do uphold
That few birds are sold
In the markets of the world, sir, for silver or gold
That will equal our chippies, hy thunder!

In England, my friend,
Such a marvel would end
In naught but the nation's uprising;
While here one just sits
By the chippy, whose wits
Are wracked how to stick us another two-bits
For the drinks that are worse than surprising.

But the police have a trick,
And they think it quite slick,
Of placing—O ancient invention!—
Some salt on the tail
Of each chippy hird frail
Which, sooner or later, will land them in jail—
An unpopular place of detention.

THE aftermath of the Mardi Gras ball has not left a very charming flavor, so many things arose to tinge the festive night with bitterness. Some say the scant attendance of the swagger set will meet its reprisals at the hands of individual members of the Association, who each thought (naturally enough) that his own presence at the ball would be sufficient attraction for the fashionable he or she, as the case might be; and the faithful few who braved alike the weather and the swim and went to the ball, will have a snug corner in the remembrance of the Colonel and the Major, at least. Some of the society women are wondering if they made a faux pas after all. (French sounds so much better than mis-liek.)

In choosing a resort for the summer campaign it is somewhat amusing to note the various motive-influencing the selection of father, mother, and child, of fashionable circles. Pater familias says: "Why do you want to get away from a comfortable home to swelter at an inn?" Mater, with an eye to profit as well as pleasure, weighs the chances of her girls meeting possible rich husbands in Eastern tourists. vide Jennie Catherwood, and says Coronado or Del Monte. The girls themselves sigh for B'lingham jollities, and suggest San Mateo. The children delight in the woods near Castle Crags. But one and all unite on San Rafael, where easy access to the city satisfies father, cosy card parties of an afternoon charms mother, rides, drives, paper chases, tennis, dances, and lots of city beaux, with urbane Major Warfield catering for the pleasure of every one, content the girls, and the men are ready for any place where so many attractions abound. Hence, no wonder the Hotel Rafael is going to be the choice of so many fashionable people this summer.

French lessons, conversation classes, etc., are now taking the time of our swells. Maids and matrons, beaux and belles, alike are studying the "Parley vous" in order to be up to the requirements of French opera. So far as comprehending the words the singers sing, however, they might leave it alone. It takes a pretty good scholar to follow intelligibly a foreign language on the stage, especially when vocally given.

The old hoys of society are fairly trembling in their boots—and out of them, too, no doubt—for fear some cruel she will take the line adopted by Emily Soldene with the English swells, and publish a list of the wealthy admirers of actresses, Midway Plaisance attractions, and sich. What a sensation it would create! almost equal to the long-talked-of memoirs written by a pioneer physician's wife.

There is much mourning among the girls over the probable loss of Lieutenant Winn, whose term of connection with the University will soon be at an end. It does not follow, however, that the popular officer will necessarily be lost to San Francisco. Every one who has a pull with the new Secretary of War is being thought of by the huds as means to an end.

Gossip says that Carson will be the next chap to eschew single blessedness and offer himself at Hymen's shrine, but who the fair one is that is to share in the "announcement" is not yet definitely known, although many surmises are indulged in by his friends.

Said a matron to a Colonial dame last week, "What's this fuss about, anyway? There's nothing revolutionary in it, is there?" Replied the other, "Why, it's sorrow, sis, over the leave-taking of Mrs. Dr. Younger. See!"

Handsome, popular, genial Raphael Weil will be here in time to take in the opera, and will be warmly welcomed by hosts of friends after his long visit abroad.

Poor Prince Carnival, hasn't he been catching it from the women scribes anent his appearance and dance (?) at the Mardi Gras ball? Tony declares, say his friends, that an ungrateful public shall behold him in satin arrayed never more, but he will hie him to his rural home and meditation.

Riding parties by day, and card parties by night, are serving to carry the huds pleasantly along the stream of time during the dark season of Lent.

There is a universally expressed hope among society people that the excellent rendition of Caste by amateurs on March 1st, may be repeated some time during the Easter season.

Mrs. M. J. Butler

Bound in Shallows, a novel by Eva Wilder Brodhead. Illustrated. Published by Harper and Brothers. New York. 1897.

A Book of the Week. A young man named Dillon, who has been guilty of some serious defalcations in a position of trust, is sent to a little Kentucky town in the hope that the quiet and peace of the place may tone up his physical and moral energies. Being a young man who always takes whatever offers itself in the way of diversion, he makes love to a nice girl living in the place, telling her in a general way that he has lived a gay life, and has committed various errors for which he is sincerely penitent, but giving her no idea that his misdeeds qualify him for residence in the State penitentiary. The girl believes it to be her duty to accept his attentions, and to try to play the part—generally a very thankless one—of guardian angel to him. How this gentle impulse on her part is rewarded we will leave the reader to find out from a perusal of the story. Running through the tale is a narrative of the courtship of a second pair of lovers in humbler life, who also have a hard time of it. The mother of Alexa Bohun, the village girl, supplies the humorous element. The story is fairly written, though it is, to our thinking at least, somewhat overlaid with descriptions of scenery and natural phenomena, which somehow or other, unless scientifically treated, always rather weary us. At the very best, they break the thread of the story, and shed little or no light on the motives of the characters. They are, in fact, of an epenthetic nature. The following description of the irresponsible flitting hither and thither of a butterfly on a summer's day strikes us as queer: "Lucy laughed to herself over the profligate intimations of the little creature wastefully winnowing its flowery wings in the June herbage." We, too, laughed to ourselves as we read. Nor are we certain that we fully appreciate the state of mind of the hero, at the moment when "the sky seemed to him to be full of atoms, frothing and whirling in a rush of blue, ceaselessly active, as if life, vibrating in the atmosphere, were endowed in its least point with all the barren restlessness of the soul of humanity." This seems to us, with apologies to the writer of it for our lack of understanding, to be sound and fury, signifying nothing. Had the atoms been green or red, we should have thought it an attempt to describe the sensations of trembling delirium. The volume is nicely printed, and is further provided with a pretty cover and some illustrations.

An American Nobleman; a story of the Canaan wilderness, by William Armstrong. Published by Rand, McNally & Company, Chicago and New York. 1896.

Abel Long, the American nobleman of the story, has for years been head over ears in love with Josephine, who, though she appreciates his devotion and avails herself of it without scruple whenever it suits her convenience to do so, heaps all the wealth of her affection upon a worthless fellow named Carrico, who, by his airs of affected superiority to the ordinary country folk, tickles her woman's vanity. Carrico, cloyed with domestic bliss, deserts her, and the fair Josephine, as woman will, falls back for assistance upon her devoted but unrewarded lover. After a long interval, during the whole of which Josephine sighs and watches incessantly for the good-for-nothing fellow who holds her fluttering heart in the hollow of his hand, Abel Long, in deference to the wishes of his mother, marries, choosing a woman whose previous life had not been all that it should have been. At first, soothed by the kindness of her husband, and by the comfort of an assured maintenance, she conducts herself discreetly enough, but in an evil moment meets one of her former admirers, and, unable to resist his advances, ere long runs away with him. The story, though on the whole somewhat painful, is interesting, and contains one amusing chapter, headed "Gold-finding on Sas'fras Mountain"—a humorous account of the wild excitement caused by the discovery in a garden of a small bit of gold, which afterwards turns out to be the filling of a decayed tooth. Though we do not know that Abel Long does anything especially characteristic of a nobleman, or achieves anything that might reasonably be rewarded with ennoblement, yet he is a worthy fellow, who does his duty under very trying circumstances.

Literary log-rolling is all very well in its way, and we all do it now and then: but it certainly does seem to us that Collier's Weekly does more of it in less time, and in a more hare-faced and unblushing manner, than most of us would care to do. This weekly paper is almost wholly written by Messrs. Edgar Saltus, Edgar Fawcett, and Julian Hawthorne—all very estimable men, but each possessed of so strong a sense of the estimableness of his fortunate collaborators as to be rather trying to outsiders. A story by Julien Gordon (Mrs. van Rennselaer Cruger) is running through the columns of the Weekly. Now, let us see how the log-rolling is done. In his department entitled "Our Note-Book," Mr. Edgar Saltus says appropos of Mrs. Cruger's story: "I am much honored and complimented to note the appearance of Mrs. van Rennselaer Cruger. Under the name of Julien Gordon, she has given the world assortments of samples of the very best art. Here or in England I know of no living woman, very few living men, whose prose has seemed to me as excellent. There is a quality in it to be envied and admired." Then Mr. Saltus goes on to say of the Weekly that has the honor of printing Mrs. Cruger's prose: "This Weekly is unique. It combines and conveys in each issue information on every" (the italics are ours) "important topic it provides entertainment, instruction, and art. As Mr. Tree said, It is unique, and were there a superlative for that word, I would say that Mrs. Cruger's presence" (or her prose?) "will make it more so." Next comes Mr. Edgar Fawcett, who, in his department entitled "Men, Manners, and Moods," says of his collaborator, Mr. Julian Hawthorne: "Here in the Weekly he has recently given us a handful of incomparable essays He does his work with a vitality and gentle splendor all his own. He mixes landscape with character, humor with melancholy, grace with robustness, precision with spontaneity, and the whole commingling could not well be more felicitous." We have not read the incomparable Julien Gordon's story, but she can hardly do less than work in some complimentary allusions to her distinguished friend and fellow-workman, Mr. Edgar Saltus. Of course, this sort of thing indicates a charming willingness to appreciate each other's talents and the remarkable merit of the unique weekly which is honored by "the presence" of these literary folk, but is there not a little too much of it for one issue, and that a weekly one? Est modus in rebus—there is a limit in all things—is an old rule and a good one: have not these literary friends of ours forgotten it? In our opinion, they are not only "up to the limit," but "away beyond it." Nor can we repress a feeling of wonder as to whether, if the peerless Mrs. van Rennselaer Cruger were a poor country postmistress or school-ma'am, instead of being the wealthy descendant of a Dutch green-grocer, and the owner of a fine mansion with well-stocked larder and cellars, Mr. Edgar Saltus would be quite so gushing as he is.

The February-April issue of The Hesperian, which describes itself as "a Western quarterly magazine," opens with a criticism of Mrs. Thomas Humphry Ward's literary work. It is quite readable, but to a lover of accuracy is marred by the fact that "Humphry" is throughout the entire article written "Humphrey." It strikes us as strange that a writer should not care sufficiently about the accurate spelling of a well-known name to deem it worth while to consult some book of reference. Inaccuracy in easily ascertainable details makes the reader mistrust the writer in other more important ones. And we know whereof we speak, for we attended many lectures of the accomplished Mr. Thomas Humphry Ward, when he was an Oxford don. Lady Cook contributes a pleasant little essay entitled "Should the poor marry?" being evidently of opinion that they should. A review of the life and work of William Morris, and of Mrs. Fields' "Authors and Friends," with literary notes by Carrie Shaw Rice, complete an interesting issue. We cannot, however, quite agree with Mrs. Rice's estimate of "Ouida," who, though a very vain woman, with a faulty English style, yet undoubtedly possesses literary ability. Nor, though Mrs. Rice does say that Marion Crawford is "the best modern instance of how very little literary ability it requires to become famous in these namby-pamby fin-de-siècle days," are we shaken in our belief that the author of "Mr. Isaacs" does possess the story-telling gift, and writes in a manner by no means unpleasing or unskillful. We fear that Mrs. Rice is endeavoring to be sharp without having any literary standard by which to judge the objects of her criticism. Mrs. Rice falls foul of the use of the term "Britisher," which, though an ugly, is at any rate a convenient term to denote a native of the British Isles, when we either do not know, or do not wish to lay stress on, the particular section of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in which he was born. If we do not use "Britisher," we must fall back on "Englishman" or "Briton," and "Englishman" means a native of England, excluding Welshmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen; while "Briton" is generally used in a rather jingoistic sense. I fear that we must now and then use "Britisher" till a better substitute is found. And will Mrs. Rice kindly tell us what a "savory female" is?

The March issue of The Overland Monthly contains a well-illustrated account of Sir James Brooke, the remarkable Englishman whose career in Borneo is more surprising than a romance. The article is contributed by Mr. Rounseville Wildman, who has visited the present Rajah of Sarawak, Sir Charles Brooke. Another copiously illustrated article is the second installment of Messrs. Bolton and Laing's account of their exploring trip last year in Vancouver Island. It is entitled "The Central Crags of Vancouver," and brings the narrative down to August 10th, the day on which the explorers reached Great Central Lake. Other weightier articles deal with "The Society of Pioneers of California," "The Municipal Misgovernment of San Francisco," and a trip made by the signal corps of the Second Brigade of the National Guard. Stories and book-reviews fill out the issue.

REGINALD H. WEBSTER.

REGINALD H. WEBSTER, who has just been declared to be the regularly elected Superintendent of Schools of this city, and who took his office on the 8th inst., graduated from the State university in 1877 with the degrees of A. B., A. M., and soon thereafter became a teacher in the schools of San Francisco, and has been continuously so engaged since January, 1878.

Reginald H. Webster.

Professor Webster is, above all things, a practical man. He believes in meeting all the requirements of the public schools in the most direct and business-like manner. He is not a stickler for stilted forms, but believes in simplification rather than the elaboration of the system of public instruction.

The Professor having been for a long time employed in the schools, has invaluable knowledge of their requirements. His belief that there should be concentration, and the more complete teaching of the primary and grammar department studies, for the reason that a great majority of scholars do not get beyond these grades is sound. The education necessary to ordinary pursuits—the school requirements that fit the average person for the intelligent duties of citizenship, are obtained in these departments. If they be thoroughly inculcated, Professor Webster holds, the public school system has discharged its duty.

The professor holds that the training of the body after the German system should accompany the training of the mind, and regards physical culture as important. He thinks that the school buildings are imperfect and inadequate, and favors issuing bonds to build new ones, or else making a sufficient appropriation to rebuild the five schools now occupied, in six or eight years. He believes in good salaries for good service, and the maintenance of a high degree of efficiency in all departments of the public schools of San Francisco.

"A perfect type of the highest order of excellence in manufacture."

Affairs on Pine Street.

By the time the members on the reform and anti-reform benches in the Pine-street institution get through with their interminable discussion, the speculating public will not even be looking on from afar—they will have their backs turned forever upon the wrangling factions and their game. The result of the recent entanglements over the Norcross and Curry elections will set many people thinking that the whole job is put up in the interests of a set of officials who want to hold positions for life. If you cannot get new ones in by the tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum of law as it comes down from the local hench; it naturally goes without saying that the other fellows stay in until Death takes a hand in the business. It also would indicate that there never yet has been a legal mining election held in the State, a pretty fine condition of affairs. The tangle in opinions and actions of not only mining corporations, but all others, will soon be such as to tie up the bands of the Directors and leave them powerless to act in any matter. Everyone connected with the Comstock mining business knows that without the vote of proxies there could have been no election held, and there never can be. The stocks of the different companies are so widely scattered that it would be absolutely impossible to get a quorum. It seems sensible enough and only right that stock should supercede a proxy when available, but when that is unavailable, what is to be done if the law steps in and says a proxy cannot be voted? In the meantime, while the courts here are putting more kinks in the tangle by straightening matters out in the legal fashion for which California is rapidly becoming famous, the market will be at the mercy of the four winds, while shareholders verging on senility will have to foot the bills of the litigants. It is all very well for the Norcross Directors to go to law. The longer they hold office the more salary they draw. How about the people who are assessed to pay the lawyers, an additional and expensive tax upon the body corporate. The mines may evidently soon be eliminated out of the game entirely. The gamble will be upon the favorable or unfavorable judgment of the law courts.

Outlook on the Brunswick.

In view of the untoward condition of affairs in the speculative mining market, and the sheer impossibility of mining conditions influencing it one way or the other just now, a person may perhaps be permitted to say a favorable word about the Brunswick lode without being accused of an attempt to bull stock for the purpose of jobbery. When Chollar-Brunswick was quoted at over $2 per share, and the stock was largely held by a highly respectable class of the public, its value was gradually undermined, and the confidence of investors shaken by statements that the only ore found consisted of a few "streaks and bunches," and that there was no possibility of a development of importance. Mining has continued, notwithstanding the efforts made to shut down work on this ground, with the result that the company is to-day in a position to turn out more ore and of a higher grade than any other property listed on the board. Eleven thousand dollars materialized last week from these "streaks and bunches," and the work was handicapped by severe weather. Had the management possessed any of the old-time grit which protected stocks from raids, the wreckers in this case would not have had the chance to work an injury to the shareholders by mendacious and infamous reports.

To Work the Holmes Tailings.

Colonel W. J. Sutherland, President of the Holmes mine of Candelaria, Nevada, arrived in town during the week, looking as if the trip across the Atlantic had benefited him considerably. He will remain here for some time, and inaugurate a process known as the "Bailey," for working the tons of tailings which have been lying at the Belleville mills for years past. As these tailings run high in the precious metals, the enterprise ought to benefit the Holmes shareholders financially.

A Mining Deal Which Fizzled.

In reply to an esteemed contemporary, the Evening Telegraph of Grass Valley, regarding a proposed transaction in Nevada county, the mine was not named for the reason that the deal did not culminate. It does not follow that because some people believe their property worth more money than an expert thinks it is upon investigation that the same property is valueless. It might, however, appear so to others, and the refusal to close negotiations at a certain figure being regarded in the light of condemnation. In other words, the property, possibly a very good one, would get a black eye and everybody knows what that means in the mining market. The NEWS LETTER, while free enough to criticize a mine on its merits when it comes down to an arranged deal, does not propose to injure any person's property upon the mere ipse dixit of an individual expert on a mere question of values, who may be right or may be wrong, as the case may be. There is a difference of opinion on the subject, that is all. This is the reason, and a fair one, we believe, why properties not named from time to time, in mentioning instances of legitimate negotiations which flattened out and came to naught. It would be very wrong to do so, in the interest of the mine owner, working him perhaps an irreparable injury, and we believe the Telegraph will look at the matter in the same light when it comes to think of it. The property referred to was not, however, located directly in the neighborhood of Grass Valley, although it unquestionably is in Nevada county.

White Hills Mines Again.

It is not so long ago since a furore was created by the alleged mineral discoveries at White Hills, north of Kingman, A. T., and not far from the Colorado river. A prospector named Shafer made the strike, and money afterwards, by a sale to Colorado people, who thought they had the world by the ears. Shafer turned his steps Californiward, and Arizona has seen him no more. He took a fall out of a mine in El Dorado County for a while, or it took a fall out of him, one of the two. In any event he is now in other business than mining, somewhere about Los Angeles. From latest accounts, the Colorado men who stepped into his old shoes at the White Hills are now anxious to unload their holdings on some one else, and British capitalists are mentioned in connection with the proposed deal. Without knowing anything about these mines, good, bad, or indifferent, but appreciating at the same time the ability and pluck of the average Colorado mining man, it is safe to conclude that any cast-off in this quarter is not a safe pick-up for any one, let alone a foreign corporation. Verb. sap., etc.

Another Mining Mystery Abroad.

The typical modesty of the daisy is thrown completely in the shade by that new corporation which has just blossomed in London, calling itself the Micbell Mine Syndicate, Ltd. All it asks for is $125,000, which it is willing to put into "gold and silver mines, mining rights and auriferous land" in California or—elsewhere. Dear me! possibly if this half dead and alive drone were exploited, we would find this "elsewhere" right under foot somewhere in the vicinity, and nowhere else outside of California. What can be expected from a company so modest that it cannot hear to mention mine or district, for fear, perhaps, that the small size of the capital might shock some one. Some North of England people figure as the promoters of this "elsewhere" proposition which looks small enough to be located anywhere for that matter. Can an obliging reader unravel the mystery by locating this property?

What's in A Name?

The fact that someone named Rathhunn brought suit against one McNear for some small sum in connection with the sale of a quick silver property in Colusa, has afforded some people an opportunity to condescend with the well-known and highly popular cluhmau, Major J. L. Rathbone, who happens to own some highly productive property of this class in the same locality. A mistake of this kind, which could, of course, only be made by some casual acquaintance, is the source of much quiet amusement to the Major and his more intimate friends.

I CAN but feel that the camera's zeal,
 And the artist's tireless skill,
 As well as each pen of those Carson men,
 Are insufficient. Still
 For the new? I thirst. Which foot goes first
 When Bob sprints out of doors?
 You scribes are slow! Shall I never know
 If champion Corbett snores?
 Pray take more pains, oh, men of brains,
 Your items to disclose—

 And the freckles on Fitz's nose!

IT is not often that a versifier is indiscreet enough to print his "pomcs" without having first obtained permission so to do from the head of our local Vigilance Committee. Poet W. V. Bryan, however, has been rash enough to rush into publicity, and tell in broad daylight the little things God whispered to him in the night. Mr. Bryan's thoughts flow from him as easily as water from a coked drain, and his metre kicks as naturally as an Arizona mule. None of these virtues, however, should save him from the hangman.

AS an extenuation of their crime, the dairymen who furnished the City and County Hospital with adulterated milk, urge the point that clean water only was used, as well as the finest of sand. Their next move, doubtless, will be to argue that they are humanitarians in disguise, since they might have used stagnant water, and cobblestones instead of sand. The investigation may terminate in resolutions thanking the gentlemen for their kindly consideration of the city's patients.

SISTER Oakland appears to have a plethora of ministerial Lotharios. The latest to attain notoriety is William M. Lane, who in his unholy yearnings for the world, the flesh, and the devil, sought to sbake religion, wife, and children at one and the same time. It is discouraging to learn that this pastoral person intends to live hereafter in San Francisco. A tip to the brethren of the pulpits hereabouts: Why not convert each other before taking ordinary sinners in hand?

ONE Quigg has been sued for the embezzlement of a leg. This is not the outgrowth of an election feud, as might be imagined. Quigg does not pull legs for a living. He manufactures them, and failed to deliver one of these patent extremities to a customer who had ordered it, whereupon he has been sued in the sum of $58. Doubtless, many a politician is sigbing with envy that Quigg should get off so cheaply.

A LOCOMOTIVE toppled off its track in the lower part of the city of Stockton the other evening, and the whistle-valve being open, it tooted away until there was no more steam in the boiler. Whereat, the people of Stockton, not knowing the real reason of the prolonged whistling, and being desirous of attributing it to the occurrence of some great event, passed the proud rumor swiftly from mouth to mouth: "Jim Budd's 'Panz' has got pups!"

SCIENTIFIC Eating, or the Proper Use of the Knife and Fork, is to be taught at that progressive institution, the State University. The CRIER is acquainted with certain professors of that college, and can testify that a good field exists among them for further proficiency in that useful acquisition.

IF the late Asa Fisk is permitted to stray as far north as Heaven, he will have all he can do to take up the angels' notes. Such business prospects may not, however, brighten Asa's astral vision. It is generally believed that Satan has a mortgage on the money-lender's soul and is already taking steps to foreclose it.

A CERTAIN Baumann is seeking damages for cows killed by order of the Board of Health. The fellow should be glad that he was not sentenced to death by drinking his own diseased milk.

BENEATH this stone doth lie "Long Green,"
 Who, hid from view, is not obscene.

THE gentlemanly lady who rejoices in the proud distinction of being the better half of Jim Corbett, considers the position her husband occupies immeasurably greater than the lowly calling of an "effeminate dry-goods clerk" at $6 per week. Go hide thy head in a punehing bag, wadam! The dry goods clerk is a man, while the fighter is lower than the brute, seeing that he is given the intelligence to rise to greater station. Honcst folk will associate with the former but not with the latter. Get thee to a nunnery before it rains.

SIX school teachers have been unfeelingly debarred from drawing double salaries. The startling inuovation of preventing the industriously idle of the city from helping themselves to the treasury should be cultivated until it reaches the departments where greater cause for its exercise prevails. Our bosses have so long taken our money for their gains that any sort of protest against them should be encouraged.

DR. CORNWALL'S suggestion that all physicians should study the art of acting and endeavor by their posture and facial expression to influence their patients is a good one. Even if they do not influence they may amuse, and that will be giving us something for our money. "Dr." Cook, for instance, might go through the motions of using his jaws; and "Dr." Sweany with his luxuriant whiskers might impersonate the wild man of Borneo.

A ROYAL nuisance, it appears,
 Is Liliuokalani; that
 With half a century of years
 At Uncle Sam she fondly leers,
 And coolly to the White House steers.
 A plague upon this lump of fat!
 This "dusky queen" with beefy arms,
 And sundry hula-hula charms!
 If she should chance again this way,
 Let's take her sailing on the bay,
 Then suddenly, with one accord,
 Just shove her gently overboard.

FOR sentencing one Ah Jim to six montbs for kissing Mrs. Holmes, Justice Groezinger should be severely censured by press and pulpit and his decision reversed by the Supreme Court of this enlightened land of freedom. The Chinese have long been derided for their heathenish tastes, and now that one of them shows signs of a superior intelligence he is thrown into a dungeon and bis expansion is nipped in the bud!

THE shoes that Corbett will wear in the fight have been exported hitherward from St. Louis. The box containing the precious freight was handled tenderly en route, with all the deference due such sacred objects of worship. St. Louis has done itself proud. But no city has been found having a hat big enough to fit the bead of the winner in the coming mill.

IT is announced by a morning paper as a piece of extraordinary news that the doctors of the city have agreed on a business proposition. The fact is, that whatever may be their various "schools," the medicos invariably preserve a brotherly equanimity beautiful to see when things get down to a business basis.

One point there is on which they all agree—
 The length, and breadth, and thickness of a fee.

ENQUIRING CORRESPONDENT: No, the "wild man of Berkeley" who has been terrorizing the inhabitants of the college town by his mysterious actions is not the person you suspect, although in point of whiskers the resemblance is striking. Judge Campbell resides on this side of the bay.

'TIS said that virtue hath its own reward.
 Well, maybe this is true in other lands,
 But here vice, trampling o'er the grassy sward,
 With gun and bludgeon, threatening stands,
 Bids trembling virtue bait, throw up its hands.
 Alas, poor saint, a prey to coarsest wit,
 (Well may the angels weep at sight of it)
 In San Francisco thy reward is—nit!

WE shall soon be rid of Butler, but need not feel embarrassed and lonely because of that. Durrant still blossoms in the midst of us.

THE Niggers' Conventiow will be held next July at Fresno, that place being half way between Hades and Africa.

DEAR EDITH: I notice that there are still quite a number of Empire coats on the market, and one or two new designs which add to the strict Empire style mediæval features in tops and trimmings. These new coats are made of faced cloth, gray, dark fawn, or some other mild spring color. The collar is inlaid with velvet, or with some of the new black brocades. A similar inset is noticeable around the wrist of the sleeves. Machine stitching is very much in evidence, being applied in double lines around the edges of the garment and also in a second line parallel with the first. The length of the new coats is medium, the shortest coming down and just covering the hips and the longer ones extending about six inches below. There is very little tailor work in the shaping, most of the fitting being around the neck and shoulders. From the shoulder seam and the armholes the garment falls in slightly diverging lines to its lower edge. There is a handsome box pleat in the hack, and also one in front. The fastening at the neck is secured by a tab piped in velvet, and down the front run a series of larger tabs twice as wide as the one at the neck, finished in three-pointed curves and decorated by beautiful jeweled pearl buttons. These increase in size to the bottom of the jacket. The sleeves fit smoothly, but not tightly, from the wrist almost to the shoulder; from here upward they are puffed, and then are gathered so as to throw the fullness upon the upper part of the armhole. The collar is of the stock design, an inch and a half high, and then breaks into six turrets piped with velvet. It is also machine stitched, and within the stitching inset with velvet or brocade.

Some of the new spring coats shown in the East are very chic. The ornamentation is very simple, consisting of straight stitching along the edges and a second line parallel with the first, an inch distant, and also a small amount of velvet applied upon the cuffs, the two pockets and the collar. It is double-breasted, the outer lapel fastening far over upon the lower part of the left shoulder. There are two jeweled buttons up at the lapel and one down near the pockets. The real buttons and buttonholes are made in a fly beneath the ornamental buttons. The collar is stiff and stand-up, fitting the neck snugly, and thence breaking into five turrets that flare outward. The sleeves still bear a resemblance to the old balloons, being moderately puffed at the end of the shoulder and gracefully gathered around the armholes. The coat is cut away moderately, so as to curve in at the waist, but it is left loose enough there to fall gracefully to the hip. The cuffs are of moderate depth and slightly curved upon the upper edge.

The latest thing in hats is the Cissy Fitzgerald. 'Twas the fair Cissy who brought over with her fresh from London town the pretty Dutch bonnet that captured the feminine portion of New York. It's wide, flaring bows and nodding flowers, falling softly on each side of the face making it becoming to most everyone, and now, the new Fitzgerald hat, worn by that saucy, jolly little woman for the first time, sits hack on the head in a similar fashion. It was made of fine black chiffon, the front of the honnet turned back in several point like leaves of a tulip. From either side come full plaited huds of chiffon, giving a very chic appearance to the hat and wearer as well. The front is filled full with soft pink velvet roses, and the hack has a jet piece snugly on the hair. It is by far the quaintest and most striking hat, to be a modest one, seen so far this season.

Modistes say that the holero jacket will flourish this year as the balloon sleeves did a year ago. The halloons, by the way, are not out of style. They were so becoming that women still wear them, and dresses a season old can be worn as though fashioned this year—if they have a holero. The newest halloons are quite modified, and all the fullness is at the top.

"Strips of lead for what?" The young man blushed again. The room seemed painfully hot. "Why, in the hem of your sk-skirts," he stammered. "My skirts?" echoed the tall beauty. DOUBT.—SOPHIE M. ALMON-HENSLEY.

I DO not know if all the fault be mine,
Or why I may not think of thee and be
At peace with mine own heart. Unceasingly
Grim doubts beset me, bygone words of thine
Take subtle meaning, and I cannot rest
Till all my fears and follies are confessed.

Perhaps the wild wind's questioning has brought
My heart its 'melancholy, for, alone
In the night stillness, I can hear him moan
In sobbing gusts, as though he vainly sought
Some bygone bliss. Against the dripping pane
In storm-blown torrents beats the driving rain.

Nay, I will tell thee all, I will not hide
One thought from thee, and if I do thee wrong,
So much the more must I be brave and strong
To show my fault. And if thou then shouldst chide
I will accept reproof most willingly
So it hut bringeth peace to thee and me.

I dread thy past. Phantoms of other days
Pursue my vision. There are other hands
Which thou hast held, perchance some slender hands
That draw thee still to other woodland ways
Than those which we have known, some blissful hours
I do not share, of love, and June, and flowers.

I dread her most, that woman whom thou knewest
Those years ago,—I cannot bear to think
That she can say: "My lover praised the pink
Of palm, or ear," "The violets were bluest
In that dear copse," and dream of some fair day
When thou didst while her summer hours away.

I dread them, too, those light loves and desires
That lie in the dim shadow of the years;
I fain would cheat myself of all my fears
And, as a child watching warm winter fires,
Dream not of yesterday's black embers, nor
To-morrow's ashes that may strew the floor.

I did not dream of this while thou wert near,
But now the thought that haunts me day by day
Is that the things I love, the tender way
Of mastery, the kisses that are dear
As Heaven's best gifts, to other lips and arms
Owe half their blessedness and all their charms.

Tell me that I am wrong, O Man of men,
Surely it is not hard to comfort me,
Laugh at my fears with dear persistency.
Nay, if thou must, lie to me! There, again,
I hear the rain, and the wind's wailing cry
Stirs with wild life the night's monotony.

DREAM-HEAVEN.—COLLIER'S WEEKLY.

Sweet, I have seen those eyes of yours in dreams
Lit faintly with my love's reflected gleams,
And, dreaming, I have held your dream-soft hand
And tender-twined fingers (that no hand
Of jealous gold encircled) in my own;
Yea, and your very lips' culled sweetness known,
Fair, perfect petals of that flower of bliss
Your mouth, most like a radiant rose to kiss:
And held you, heart to heart, within my arms,
There sheltered from a loveless world's alarms,
And whispered in your half-averted ear,
"Heart of my heart, what has our love to fear?"
And heard that sweet low voice I love so well
Full tenderly its gentle story tell—
Bellissima, my best-loved Isabel!

All this in dreams: but then I woke to see
Those dearest eyes laugh merry scorn at me;
Those fingers I had joyed in dreams to hold
Withheld now by encircling hands of gold;
Those lips I kissed that one sweet dreamy while Curved distant now in a contemptuous smile;
That heart, that once had fluttered next my own,
Now silent—all its lava turned to stone—
An, then I learned Love's secret stairway well
Whose sad steps lead, my best-loved Isabel Bellissima, hut from Dream-Heaven to Hell!

INSURANCE.

THE Firemans Fund, which has earned quite a name for re-insurance, last week absorbed the Macon Fire Insurance Company of Macon, Ga. This deal at once gives the Firemans Fund a desirable line in the Southern States.

There is a persistent rumor on the street that there will soon be a change in the management of the Atlas in this city.

After the regular meeting of the San Francisco Life Association last night, the members and their guests adjourned to the Occidental Hotel, where a banquet was discussed with much enthusiasm.

A determined effort is being made by the brokers of this city to restore rates to within twenty-five or thirty per cent. of the old P. I. U. schedule. The movement is headed by H. M. Grant, and is made necessary, as the business of the agencies has been very seriously injured by the insurance war that has been an unfortunate part of insurance history on this coast for the past two years.

The different accident and liabilities companies doing business on the Pacific Coast continue to adhere to the rates established by the compact several months ago. The Frankfort is the only exception to the rule, and is indulging in the unremunerative joys of cutting rates. This latter company has recently withdrawn its $50,000 deposit from Oregon, and placed $200,000 with Massachusetts for the protection of policy holders.

Manager Voss, since going to Chicago, has been a thorn in the side of plate glass companies—refusing to fraternize with them; but at the meeting just held there, he surprised the officers by appearing at their conference, and will doubtless "get in out of the wet."

The movement agitated a short time ago in Denver for the organization of a National Association of local agents, is meeting with every encouragement, and it is probable that within the next six months it will have on its rolls practically every local agent in the United States. This is a movement which may be credited or charged to the jealousies and opposition toward each other found in the companies and their managers, and which has sadly demoralized the insurance business on this coast and throughout the country.

The Guardian of London, which withdrew from the United States some years ago, has just issued a circular letter, in which it bitterly attacks and denounces the American insurance companies, both fire and life. This comes with a particularly bad grace from an English or any other foreign company, as it is a notorious fact that in this country there exists no discrimination against foreign companies, which cannot be truthfully said of the treatment accorded American companies in England. There are to-day but two or three companies from this side doing business in England, while millions upon millions are paid annually for British insurance here.

A good joke is traveling around insurance circles, in which two gentlemen, Messrs. Macrate and Coryell, calling themselves executive special agents for the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York, were done up beautifully by E. R. Ellis, agent Graff of the Provident Life, and actuary Evans. The latter gentlemen knew that the silk-hatted Eastern executive specials were out for big game, and learning that they were going to make an attack on a victim, managed to drop in just as the tenderfeet were getting in their work. Evans, Graff, and Ellis—old, hardened sinners in the insurance business—persuaded a miner, a speculator, and retired capitalist. They wanted insurance, and gave Macrate and Coryell a long-distance jolly, which resulted in any number of good cigars, any quantity of insurance literature, blank applications, and a fine dinner. The Mutual Reserve executive specials never suspected that they were "up against it" at any stage of the game, and are no doubt wondering why the innocent-looking miner, the solid-looking capitalist, and the shrew speculator failed to cultivate their agreeable acquaintance.

The Rio Grande Western Railway and connections are offering low rates and superior accommodations to all points East. Before purchasing tickets, call at 14 Montgomery street.

THE fashionable Saturday Evening Dancing class has no more enthusiastic member than Eddie Shaw, who comes over from Alameda, where he is known as the "Ned Greenway of the Estuary," to attend each fortnightly assembly. Like many other gilded ornaments of San Francisco society, his purse does not always keep pace with his social ambitions and, according to his own confession, through a misplaced pocket-book, he started for one of the dances with just forty cents in his pocket. Half of that modest sum was expended in purchasing a return ferry ticket, and five cents more for car fare to the scene of the festivity. After the cotillion was over he jumped on a car bound for the ferry, and meeting two friends Eddie insisted, with the air of a Monte Cristo, on paying their fares with the last dime in the bottom of his pocket. They parted from him up town, and without a penny in his pocket, this lah-de-dah young man arrived at the ferry just in time to miss the last boat. Eddie was in a quandary, not knowing whither to go, having no acquaintances within reach, and without a nickel to go to them, even if friends were attainable. After much deep and sorrowful reflection, he concluded that his only alternative was to watch for the dawn in his office at the Safe Deposit Building. He walked sadly thither, and with his feet on the mantel, to keep them from freezing, he patiently awaited the break of day. Eddie attended to business on the day after the ball, attired in evening dress, his office jacket buttoned to his chin imperfectly concealing the now rumpled splendor of his ballroom attire. He says he will never go to another cotillion with less than fifty cents.

The Baron W. E. J. Van Balveren is a graduate of the University of Amsterdam studied law at Harvard and civil engineering at the University of California, but he has failed to grasp the intricacies of the English language. Like many foreigners, he is supremely unconscious of his idiomatic defects, believes he speaks our language like a native and his confidence even leads him to trifle with that to him, linguistic buzz-saw, American slang. The Baron intends no impropriety, but on the contrary is so careful about small matters that he is often considered a prude. Apropos of this, an anecdote is going the rounds of the Burlingame Club to the effect that a lady Van Balveren knows has a fine Spitz dog, for which she has no other name than "Little Spitz." This so shocks the Baron's modesty that he gravely refers to the canine as "Little Saliva," with the accent on the first syllable, to the great edification of his friends. But that is another story. At the latest meet of the San Rafael Hunt Club, the Baron had arranged to ride with a young matron, and just as the signal to start was given, all the Dianas and Nimrods of the fashionable set were shocked to hear the Baron call pleasantly from the veranda of the hotel, to the lady whom he was to accompany:

"Go chase yourself around the block, madam, while I go upstairs and change me ridin' breeches."

The Baron would now like to know how such an innocent remark could possibly give offence to a reasonable woman.

It not infrequently happens that Mr. Hearst, of San Francisco and New York, issues the mandate to "do somebody up," but to be hoist with his own petard is not a happy experience for Willie. Perhaps for that very reason, those familiar with the circumstances derive much diversion from the Examiner-Journal's unconscious but successful attempt to do themselves up. The efforts of Mr. Hearst to copyright the chaste and elegant utterances of the Carson pugilists have made the managers of other papers specially desirous of securing exclusive details concerning the fighters. In desperation, the New York World a week ago telegraphed to W. C. Bunner, its San Francisco correspondent, ordering an interview about anything at all with Mrs. Pugilist Corbett, who was then sojourning here. Bunner's written request to the lady for an interview was met with a cold refusal, Mrs. Corbett being fearful that her utterances might vitiate her husband's contract with Mr. Hearst. Then Bunner achieved a master stroke of diplomacy, writing on his card a curt intimation that anything Mrs. Corbett desired to say regarding Pompadour Jim's alleged mistreatment of her would be published in the World. Her woman's pride could not withstand this insinuation, and in a long tête-à-tête Bunner was given many assurances that Corbett is everything he ought to be. This gratifying information he repeated to the World to the extent of a couple of columns.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Corbett's fear that she had been indiscreet induced her to wire Jim at Carson, and the fighter retailed the communication to his friend, Mr. Hearst. Last Saturday the New York Journal published in large type on its front page, a warning to its readers not to believe the unauthorized statement which would be published simultaneously in the World, as it was false in every particular. Of course the intelligent reader promptly turned to the World to peruse the fearful scandal, and read in extenso the malignant statement that Corbett is a model husband! Mr. Corbett has demanded an apology from Mr. Hearst.

Apropos of the accident at Casa Grande, which delayed the arrival of the French company who opened the Grand Opera season at the California Theatre on Wednesday evening, a good story is told at the expense of Nestor Massart, the tenor. When the spreading rails brought the train, with many a hump and jar, to a sudden stop on the Arizona desert last Sunday night, many of the ladies thought that a serious accident had befallen them, and that they were on the verge of death, or at least of an awful catastrophe. Massart, however, who had been for weeks posting himself on the West by reading wild stories of Arizona life, believed that the train had been attacked by Apache Indians, whom he supposed roamed over the territory in all their aboriginal ferocity. He warned all his fair friends to keep behind their curtains while he reconnoitered. Just as he cautiously poked his head out from his berth, the Pullman porter entered the car to allay the fears of the singers. In the dim light, Massart mistook the dark visage of the porter for that of an Apache chief. Wrapping himself in many bed-clothes to form a shield against the anticipated arrows of the redmen, he leaped from his berth to the center of the car, and hurled his boot at the porter.

"You shall kill me before you molest these ladies. I gif my heart blood for dem," he shouted, with tragic heroism, in his best English, not knowing that Arizona Indians understood French.

Then Massart fell forward, half dead with fright, the bed-clothes carefully pulled over his head. It required repeated assurances to convince the opera singer that he had not been slain. A day later, at Banning, he saw a real Arizona Indian by daylight. Since then, it has not been safe to refer to the episode in Massart's presence.

Bohemia has blessed the mining schemes which brought back to San Francisco a few days ago that bon vivant, cluhman, musician, artist, composer, amateur actor and attorney, Joe Redding, having in his wake a string of Englishmen on gilt-edged investments bent. A day or two after their arrival, Joe gave a dinner at the Bohemian Club to Sir Bache Cunard and the other wealthy Britishers who comprised the party. Redding's many theatrical experiences have taught him how to work up to one of his bon mots, so he deftly steered the dinner talk through the depths and shallows of the Greco-Turkish situation.

"By the way, Sir Bache," said Joe, when the conversation had, under his management, reached the proper point for the climax, "As you did not bring your valet with you, you will have the unpleasant job of shining your own shoes while you are in San Francisco."

"Bless my soul!" commented Sir Bache in consternation, adding just as Redding intended that he should: "Have they no bootblacks in this town?"

"Well,—they had," replied Joe. "But they have all responded to their country's call. All the shiners are on their way to Greece."

"Pawing Horse" is the sobriquet bestowed by his friends on T. Carey Friedlander, secretary of the San Francisco Produce Exchange, since he has become of the turf turf. One of the Ingleside races, a few days ago, brought only four horses to the pole. A long shot, Yankee Doodle, was quoted by the bookmakers at one hundred to one, but Carey could see nothing in the race except the favorite, Imp. Ivy, on which the bookmakers cautiously quoted only one to three. Nothing daunted at being obliged to give instead of to take odds, "Pawing Horse" played Ivy to win, for place and for show. He could hardly believe his eyes and ears when the long shot won, while Ivy, the favorite, passed under the wire, a bad fourth. Carey had lost all of his three bets. He said he felt unsteady on his feet.

"Water! Water!" he gasped tragically and when, while Dan Murphy supported him, Bob Woodward brought a glass of water to the unlucky Carey, he sniffed the beverage disdainfully.

"I would not have thought it of you, 'Weary,'" he said reproachfully to Woodward, with recovered animation.

And now the race track barkeepers always offer "Pawing Horse" a glass of water before instead of after each little drink.

A little story is current within club circles that the Society of Arts and Crafts is trying to worry along without Willis Polk, who was its organizer and during the years of its infancy its moving spirit. Willis has a little way of running foul of the management of every club he joins and with each social organization his connection in time becomes merely that of an ex-member. The Arts and Crafts, being a modest institution, maintained no permanent quarters, and it charged its members as dues only fifty cents a month. Such a sum was so trivial that of course Willis ignored it. After he had been a member for three years and his unpaid dues aggregated eighteen dollars, the directorate became restive and pressed Willis for payment of his congested club account. In response Willis sent a characteristic letter requesting that his "resignation be accepted for non-payment of dues." The reply of the management was indirect and Polk considers it harsh. The founder of the organization was unceremoniously dropped from its roll and now Willis is an ex-member of another club.

That affability is no part of an attorney's equipment has long been the contention of James L. Robison, once managing editor of the defunct Alta, now chief clerk of the law firm of Rodgers and Paterson. Robison has carefully cultivated brusque and unlovely manners, and is far from being the most agreeable man in the world. In fact, not to place too fine a point upon it, lawyers who are brought into frequent contact with him, have noted him the most crabbid individual they know. No phase of Robison's idiosyncracies has escaped the notice of Judge Van Rensselaer Paterson, whose dry humor is very much appreciated in the Pacific Union Club. His chief clerk was under discussion.

"Robison is the most even-tempered man I know," declared Paterson with positiveness, his statement being greeted with deprecatory shrugs, until he completed his comment.

"Yes," he added, "he is very even tempered. He is always mad."

At a recent social function one of the dowagers who had just acquired a new niece, through engagement of her nephew, was the centre of attraction in the ball-room. While being the recipient of congratulations Mr. M. Kahn, a gentleman familiarly known to his friends as the essence of politeness, overhearing the word niece, approached, and in his most polished manner inquired after the condition of the mother. As niece number two only put in an appearance four or five days later, his friends as well as le monde are having a good laugh at his expense. This time it is a case of "politesse oblige."

"Why does not the Western Union produce those incriminating telegrams and end this prolonged agony?" was asked of Frank Jaynes, Superintendent of the Telegraph Company, as the Legislative investigation of the Examiner dragged out its tedious existence.

"Well, we would," was the naive reply, "but neither the Legislature nor the Examiner want to see those dispatches."

And the long-suffering constituent wonders if it is a case of horse and horse.

THE first event of the Lenten season was the reception given by Mrs. E. W. McKinstry, on Thursday last, to the Colonial Dames, which was one of the pleasantest yet held. Several interesting papers were read, and some delicious refreshments discussed with the more stirring topics of the day, and the afternoon was one of great enjoyment. Next came the tea which Sorosis gave on Saturday, the motif being the departure of Mrs. W. J. Younger, who left this week to join her husband in Chicago, and nearly all the members were present to bid her adieu. The club rooms were ornamented with baskets of flowers and garlands of foliage, the President, Mrs. W. B. Carr, receiving the guests as they arrived, assisted by a number of other ladies. There was music and refreshments, and the afternoon, despite the dreadful weather outside, was very pleasantly passed. During the Lenten period the club has arranged for a series of lectures on Wagner and his compositions, which will be delivered every Tuesday afternoon by Henri Fairweather and his talented wife, which will without doubt be both interesting and very enjoyable.

Mrs. Younger was guest of honor at the red and yellow luncheon given by Mrs. James Goewey last Monday, when she entertained a dozen ladies very charmingly. Luncheons are likely to be quite a feature in social circles the coming few weeks, though cards will probably be the more popular way of entertaining one's friends. Numerous clubs have already been formed, and several more are being arranged for both afternoon and evening, those of the afternoon being composed exclusively of ladies, while the sterner sex will not be excluded in the evening.

The great event of the present week was the inauguration of the season of French opera at the California Theatre on Wednesday night, when L'Africaine was sung to an audience composed of our fashion, youth and beauty. Opera parties will now of course be the correct thing in our swim, and a more delightful way of passing an evening it would be difficult to find.

In these days of "tinted" weddings it is absolutely refreshing to note one of pure white, the hue which our grandmothers tell us was in their day considered the only suitable one for brides. The one alluded to was that of Miss Mayhelle Gerst and Sam Naphthaly, which was celebrated at the California Hotel last Sunday evening. The decorations of the dance-room, in which the ceremony was performed, were of white roses, fruit blossoms, lilies and green foliage; at one end a canopy of the Stars and Stripes was placed, from which was suspended a pure white wedding bell, underneath which the bridal party stood while the Rev. Dr. Voorsanger tied the nuptial knot. The bride's costume was of white satin, a tulle veil and wreath of orange blossoms. She was unattended except by two little flower bearers, Annie Seller and Amy Schmidt. An elaborate supper was served after the ceremony and then there was dancing. The presents were many and of much value, including jewels, silverware, cut glass, etc. Mr. and Mrs. Naphthaly are spending their honeymoon at Coronado.

Another wedding of Sunday last was a home ceremony, performed at the residence of the bride's parents on Eddy street, when Miss Jessie Kutner and Alfred Kutner were pronounced man and wife by the Rev. Jacob Nieto, underneath a canopy of red and white roses. The bride wore a robe of white satin trimmed with point lace, a tulle veil and wreath of orange blossoms and carried a bouquet of bride's roses. Miss Grace Richmond, who was maid of honor, was charmingly gowned in white mousseline de soie over Nile green silk, and carried a bouquet of violets. Miss Carrie Kutner, in pink satin and white mousseline de soie, and Miss Tillie Korn in blue satin and chiffon, officiated as bridesmaids. Louis Kutner was the groom's best man. The hall-room made a beautiful supper-room, the decorations being roses, lilies and ferns, and later there was dancing. The presents, which were exceedingly handsome, were in view in one of the upper rooms.

The Duprey-Baldwin wedding will take place at the First Unitarian Church, on Franklin street, on next Tuesday afternoon.

Recently announced engagements are of much interest in society circles, especially that of one of its favorite beaux, Jack Casserly, who has selected an Eastern girl, Miss Cecilia Cudahy, for his bride, and the wedding will probably be one of those to take place after Easter. Miss Helen Sutro made public her engagement to Samuel Schwartz last Saturday, though to intimate friends the fact has been known for some time past. Another engagement of interest to the swim is that of Miss Minnie Bradbury, of Los Angeles, to Col. Isaac H. Polk, of Guaymas, Mexico; for though both the parties are not permanent residents of this city, they are by no means unknown to social San Francisco, and here the wedding is likely to take place during the Easter season.

Among the gatherings of the close of the ante-Lenten season, were the informal tea of the Misses Smith at their home on Broadway; the pink dinner of Mrs. R. P. Schwerine, and the yellow dinner of Mrs. Louis Parrott, which were both on an elaborate scale, and also one given by Mrs. Bixler; the violet luncheon of Mrs. Van Bergen and the cotillion given by Mrs. Fortman of Eddy street, at which her daughter, Miss Emma Fortman, made her début in society. La France roses were exclusively used for decorative purposes, in combination with smilax, and palms were arranged in the hall-room with excellent effect. Miss Emma wore a gown of white mousseline de soie over white silk, and Miss Edith Marion, another débutante, appeared in blue mousseline de soie over silk of the same hue. There were several very pretty figures danced in the German, and a handsome supper was served at midnight.

On Sunday last Miss Rosalie Neustadter and Mr. Albert Ehrman, the newly-engaged couple, received their friends at the Neustadter home, on Van Ness avenue. They were assisted by Miss Norma Bachman, Miss Minnie Louise Schwabacher and Miss Estelle Wangenheim. The long list of callers testified to the great popularity of the pair. In the evening a dinner was given, to which about thirty sat down. The table was most beautifully decorated with variegated blossoms and ferns. At midnight the party broke up after spending an extremely pleasant evening. Tonight Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Ehrman give a large affair in their honor.

Miss Leila Ellis, formerly of this city, and who has a great many friends in San Francisco, will soon give an interesting course of Southern readings in New York City. The first reading will be given at the Hotel Waldorf on the evening of March 18th. Miss Ellis has decided talent, and her appearance at the Waldorf will no doubt give pleasant emphasis to that fact.

Joe Redding has been warmly welcomed by his San Francisco friends since his arrival last week on a brief visit to his old home. Mrs. E. B. Crocker is also among recent arrivals from Gotham, which is now her home.

The many friends of Mrs. W. M. Gwin, Sr., will regret to hear of her very serious illness.

Just remember when you desire to give a dinner to your friends or get up a banquet for a society that Max Abraham at 428 Geary is the caterer for excellence. He is past master in his art, and relieves you of every anxiety on the score of what to eat, and how to prepare it.

ART JOTTINGS.

JOULLIN has certainly painted, not alone the best work he has ever attempted, but what may deservedly be termed the picture of the year. He has been gradually drifting from Chinese studies, with their opportunities of exuberant color, to the Indian, more romantic, and with no less suggestions for gorgeous effects. But in this, his latest picture, he has kept everything in tone with the tragic nature of the composition. It is entitled "Gone," and presents a young Indian kneeling by the body of his father, an old brave who has been stricken down in battle, with the blood still flowing from his green wounds. The face of the mourner is completely hidden by the masses of hair which hang over it in his attitude of utter and most touching dejection. The old chief's features are set in the rigidity of death, and the muscles of his massive arms contrast with the slim development of the mourning son. The composition is admirable, and there is nothing of exaggeration or strain at a too positive intensity in the treatment. The color is rich and harmonious, but not garish, and there is no crowding of accessories to distract the attention from the main interest of the picture. Joullin will exhibit it in New York at the spring exhibition of the Association of American Artists, where it is certain to meet with a warm reception.

Latimer has finished another picture in pastel, a woodland scene, pleasing and full of sentiment. But, as it hangs alongside the lovely mere, his previous work, one can see how far short it falls of the latter. Possibly in technique and execution it may be equal, but then artists are not inspired every day.

Charles Rollo Peters has placed on exhibition for the first time one of those moonlight pictures, to which he has exclusively devoted himself. Both are strongly original, and bear the unmistakable character of being the result of out-of-door study. In one the white light falls on the walls of a cabin, with that intensity which, unless one has observed those effects, seems unnatural. A weird cypress tree, with its gaunt branches outlined against the sky, emphasizes the effect of the strong reflection. The other presents Mr. Peters' studio by moonlight, and is also tender and original in treatment.

Fred Yates has completed a very strong portrait in oil of William Greer Harrison. The artist has succeeded not alone in making an admirable likeness of Mr. Harrison, but has caught his expression with a fidelity seldom seen in oil portraits.

John A. Stanton is working hard, but with closed doors. It is rumored in the artistic world that Stanton is just throwing himself on "a calker," and that he avoids all distraction.

Julian Rix, in New York, keeps climbing up the ladder, and swelling his bank account. The demand for his landscapes is undiminished. Emil Carlsen is doing some still-life work, and is likely to visit San Francisco this spring.

Marion Wells is making replicas of his bust of Uncle George Bromley, and the massive figure of Pan, which was made for the Midsummer High Jinks in the redwoods.

Bloomer is at work in his studio in Sausalito, and may shortly exhibit some of his pictures.

Henry Raschen is illustrating a book on American fishes, which is being prepared by order of the Smithsonian Institute. Mr. Raschen's work is very fine, and more than compares favorably with those who are engaged on the Eastern end of the book.

THE RED DOMINO—Jove, what a pretty costume! And how well she carries it. The trouble with these bal masques is that the women are so commonplace—they will not or they cannot act. They are simply wooden Miss Smith or Miss Jones dressed as Mary Stuart or La Tosca; but this one has blood in her veins. I'll bet the costume tells something of a romantic nature's revolt against conventionalism.

Ah, pretty Carmen, my color, at least, matches your's, even if the ugly shapelessness of the domino sins against every canon of the beautiful. Will you walk with me?

CARMEN—(Why, it's Fred!) Surely. Never mind the domino. I prefer you as you are.

HE (bowing low)—Thanks. (As I live, it's Edith!)

SHE (laughing)—What I intended to say is that I've never seen the nineteenth century man, off the stage, who didn't cover himself with ridicule the moment he accepted any substitute for man's best friend—his trousers. Look at that Henry the Eighth, and look, oh look at Romeo's legs. Don't look long, or you'll become cross-eyed. Either the modern man's an awful degenerate in the matter of legs, or how in the world do you account for the girls' taste in ye olden days? Now, I happen to know who Romeo is—

HE—Do tell me.

SHE—He's not a bad-looking creature in his tweeds. You'd hardly believe it, though, would you? It's Fred—Fred Kirkham.

HE—Indeed! (She doesn't know me.) I've always heard Kirkham spoken of as a downright handsome fellow.

SHE—(The coxcomb!) No, have you? Why, even the girl he's engaged to never thought that.

HE—Ah! Who is the Juliet of this unattractive Romeo?

SHE—Why, it's Edith Berry. Haven't you—that is, don't you know her?

HE—No; can't say I do. Pretty?

SHE (laughing confusedly)—He—he thinks so.

HE—How blind love is!

SHE (indignantly)—Why, how do you know if you've never seen her? (He doesn't recognize me.)

HE—I've heard her spoken of.

SHE (curiously)—Oh, have you? How—in what way?

HE (deliberately)—They say she's unattractive, a flirt, and that she really doesn't care for Kirkham.

SHE (maliciously)—Do you know, I believe there's some truth in that.

HE—Oh, you do!

SHE—Yes, and he, poor fellow, is desperately in love with her, and can't see what is apparent to all the world—Pardon, did you speak? But a man who'll wear tights with such legs is capable of anything ridiculous. The modern man had better keep to dominos, and leave to women the vanities of dress even at masquerades.

HE (warmly)—If all women could be transformed into bewitching apparitions like you, Carmen—

SHE—Do you know, I may be mistaken, and Romeo may not be Fred Kirkham.

HE—Never mind, they're uninteresting people. Tell me, why did you choose Carmen?

SHE—Why? Oh, because it typifies everything I am not supposed to be, and—this is a secret; I wouldn't tell you if you knew me—no, I wouldn't tell you. But I sometimes wonder if it's wise to show a caged bird the joy and freedom of the wild bird's life.

HE—(Who'd have thought it of Edith!) There is something charming about Carmen. The very name speaks of full, glowing life and love. (Presses her hand.)

SHE—(The wretch! Returns the pressure.)

HE—(Oh, the minx! It's lucky that I'm myself, but I might be any man for all she knows.)

SHE—Life is so prosaic, so dull, and the most prosaic thing on earth is woman's lot. You men have some hope, some chance of adventure; when we yearn for anything out of the ordinary, we—go to a masked ball.

HE (slyly)—And do you find your adventure there?

SHE—Sometimes. Oh, there's Romeo making straight for me. Do save me; I don't want to dance with legs like those.

HE—(And you shall not, my lady, nor with straighter ones, if I can manage it. I'll keep an eye on you to-night. A man doesn't admire Carmen so much when his fiancée impersonates her.) Come out into the conservatory. Now, we're alone. What will you have—an ice, some wine?

SHE (wickedly)—Champagne, if you please, and we'll drink together cosily, just you and I. Isn't it a beautiful wine? Now, I'll forget the man I'm engaged to and drink to you. And you?

HE—(Fickle flirt!) Oh, I'll drink to the sweetest Carmen that ever bewitched a man out of his senses.

SHE (emptying her glass)—A vous, monsieur.

HE—(Phew! The pace is fast, but if I don't take it with her some other fellow may.) A toi, ma belle. Another glass, do.

SHE (drinking)—A toi, mon ami.

HE—A toi, chérie.

(She holds her empty glass towards him. He kisses her wrist.)

HE—(If she permits that, I'll not leave her an instant till she's safe at home.)

SHE—(Oh, the Don Juan! I've half a mind to unmask now and see how he explains such conduct.) I think, perhaps, you'd better not do that again. The man I forgot when I drank to you, might happen to see us.

HE (tenderly)—Would you care?

SHE—He might object.

HE—Is he jealous?

SHE—A perfect fiend! Funny, isn't it, that I should tell you so much about myself when I don't know you, or worse—when I don't even know that I don't know you, or that you don't know me. But confiding in a stranger is such a natural thing.

HE—I shall not be a stranger to you hereafter. I'm sure I'll know you.

SHE—How can you tell?

HE—Do you suppose I intend to lose sight of one who has interested me so deeply—the only woman to whom I have spoken to-night?

SHE (coquettishly)—You are interested?

HE—Carmen, I love you!

SHE—(How dare he! How dare he! And suppose I wasn't myself?) Come, let's go. It's getting late; nearly twelve and time to unmask. The game's played out.

HE—But won't you listen—

SHE (hurrying on, her hands to her ears)—No, I'm tired of playing. I want to be myself now, and you know, my real self doesn't know you.

HE (hurrying after)—Will you dance the first dance after unmasking with me, then? I'll see to it that I'm properly introduced.

SHE—(It would serve him right if I were not I, and would say yes. What explanation would he give to me—the real me, I wonder? Oh, I almost hate him!)

HE (whispering)—Will you? Will you?

SHE—Yes.

HE—(I wonder how far she'll go? How the deuce she proposes to manage it, I don't know.) And you'll meet me here? Honest, now, if I let you go, you'll not play Cinderella and leave me lamenting?

SHE—I'll meet you here.

(She slips into a dressing room. The gong sounds and all unmask. He hands his domino to an attendant, and stands waiting.)

SHE (returning unmasked, her Carmen costume concealed beneath a flowing domino)—(He's waiting for Carmen.)

HE—(She's looking for the red domino).
SUE (sweetly)—Oh, Fred, where have you been all evening? Weren't you masked?

HE—I wore a domino. But I shouldn't have dreamed of looking for you in one. I thought—

SUE (hurriedly)—Oh, I always wear a domino. A costume is so theatrical.

HE (thoughtfully)—Ye-es.

SUE—Do you mind not waiting for the dance? I hate a masked ball.

HE—So do I; but don't you—

SUE (searchingly)—Then you'll take me home right away? You're sure you don't care for this dance?

HE (puzzled)—You're sure you don't?

(They get into the carriage and sit silent and thoughtful.)

SUE (soliloquizing)—I don't understand him. Why doesn't he wait for her—I mean for me. Suppose I hadn't been Carmen, she'd be expecting him now. Would he be going home with me, or would he stay to dance with her? If I were he, I'd insist upon staying. But if he were to insist, I'd never forgive him. That's sure. Didn't he care for her? He seemed very much in earnest. I'd give something to know just what he's thinking.

HE (to himself)—I can't make her out. Why doesn't she wait for the red domino to claim her for that first dance. Did she intend not to keep the promise when she made it, the witch! Or is she piqued because the Red Domino didn't come for her? No; how could he be expected to know that underneath that domino is Carmeu's dress? Her putting on that domino spoiled all my plans. Would she have revealed herself to him—supposing him not to be myself—had he appeared in red domino? I wish I knew.

STATE MINERALOGIST.

IN the appointment of A. S. Cooper, of Santa Barbara, to the position of State Mineralogist, Governor Budd has exercised excellent judgment. Mr. Cooper is well known in California, and has held several offices in Santa Barbara County. He is largely identified with the oil and asphaltum interests of the State, and is one of the best-posted men on these and kindred topics on the Coast, his library being the most complete on these subjects to be found anywhere. No doubt he will direct special attention to the development of these minerals. Mr. Cooper is an old Californian, having arrived here in 1852. He has spent a good many years in the mines of California and Nevada, and is by training and inclination especially equipped for the duties placed upon him by Governor Budd. Under his management, the office of Mineralogist will be made an important branch of State service. The position is worth $3000 per year, and controls several good appointments.

A NOTED VISITOR.

A NOTABLE scion of nobility, in the person of Sir Edward Stewart-Richard, whose estates are in Perthshire, Scotland, is at present in this city. He is the eldest son of a family whose title goes back to the sixteenth century. Sir Richard is here for the purpose of investigating the mines of California. This is his first visit to the coast. He came out by way of the Canadian Pacific, and took a look at the Rossland, B. C., mines en route. He ranks as Lieutenant in that swell organization, the 3d Black Watch Royal Highlanders of the famous 42d Regiment, which has an honored place in the history of nearly all the famous battles of modern England. Sir Richard, who is but twenty-four years old, is accompanied by W. A. Somerset, nephew of the Duke of Beaufort, a young gentleman who is making the last of several visits to the coast.

ON THE WING.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 5, 1897.

DEAR NEWS LETTER: Although the journey East has been often described and is familiar to all, it is never taken without developing features of interest and instruction, and so, to fulfill my promise, I send these passing impressions.

Our first halt was at Salt Lake, where we had a delightful drive with Robert Walker, his wife, and little child Margaret. You remember his wife, of course. She was Maggie Jones, niece of W. W. Belvin, well known on the Pacific Coast. Walker is interested in pretty nearly every enterprise about Salt Lake, including Walker Bros.' Bank, the Walker House, several big mines—in fact, so large are his investments that I cannot recollect half of them. The city has greatly changed for the better since I was there during the boom—the same boom we had in San Jose. The residences are much more substantial, owing to the very general use of brick and stone. The manufacture of brick is quite a factor there, the price for the pressed article in any color being from $5 to $12 per thousand. I cannot for the life of me understand why this excellent material should cost more at San Francisco.

Everything has been covered with snow since we left California. The ride over the Denver and Rio Grande was indeed delightful, and the Royal Gorge and the Rocky Mountains were grand. Our train was a heavy one, and made Colorado Springs an hour late, so we stopped off at that beautifully laid out town. Its avenues are one hundred feet wide, with rows of trees down the center. The trees are bare now, but one can imagine the effect when they luxuriate in their wealth of spring and summer foliage. The day was so warm and pleasant you would have thought it Menlo rather than Colorado.

We drove to Manitou, and through the Garden of the Gods—which is a private park, where Nature has placed monuments, pedestals, and pictures in magnificent profusion—time, tempest, and flood having done the carving and decoration in splendid grandeur. We left the Antlers with regret. It is said to be the best hotel in Colorado Springs; but that must refer to the table, which is certainly excellent. The rooms, however are not up to date.

At Denver we had a few hours only, but were quite in love with their main street. We were there Saturday night and the stores loomed up beautifully. We had dinner at Brown's Palace, of course. One goes there as he does to our own dear Palace; he pays the same, too, but he don't get the service by long odds. We left Denver by the C. B. & Q. The cars, the service, the table in the dining car, everything was all that could be desired. It was in fact, as near perfection, traveling, as possible. In Chicago we stopped at the Palmer House. I hadn't been there since 1886, yet it is as popular now as it was then. To keep up with the times new plumbing and furnishing have been done throughout, so that it has all the comforts of a modern hotel, and the quality that age alone can give.
